As a matter of fact there are a great many colleges and institutions in the South that are maintained, as the Senator from Georgia suggested a moment ago, by private subscription, by private endowment, by private funds. There are a great many colored boys and girls attending those colleges who are developing great aptitude for agricultural work, probably thus far not so great an aptitude as the whites have shown, but that can not be wondered at, for practically every encouragement of a substantial character that has come from the State and from the National Government has gone to the colleges where the white students are educated. There has not been the opportunity for the colored boy and the colored girl that has come to the white boy and girl. They feel that it is impossible to obtain a posttion, even if fitted for it. They have not neglected the industrial occupations, however. I want to suggest that in a good many of the Southern States they have gone into industrial work where they have had the encouragement to do so. There was a fund called the Jeanes fund, for the encouragement of students in agriculture, and under that a great deal has been accomplished in several States of the South.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator passes from that point, I want to be sure that I understand the situation, because it is a very great surprise to me if I have gathered it correctly. Is it true that in the State of Georgia there is an agricultural and mechanical college in which in 1912 there were about, or a little more than, 500 colored students? Is that the fact?

Mr. JONES. That is what the report of the Commissioner of Education shows.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is it further true that this school is conducted at an annual expense of not more than $24,000?

Mr. JONES. Those are the figures given in the report of the Commissioner of Education.

Mr. CUMMINS. To me that seems almost unbelievable. I think there must be an error somewhere in those figures. I can not conceive that you can carry on a college with 500 or 1:1 :11 more students for $24,000 per year. If that is true, they have reached some process of economy down there that is totally unknown to me. I hope the Senator from Georgia will go into that matter at some time, because certainly that can not be correct. It can not be a college which endeavors to teach these people the science of agriculture and the trades for $24,000 a

Mr. JONES. It is the school that has been designated in connection with the agricultural appropriations that our Government has made.

Mr. CUMMINS. If you take the other side of it, under the statement made by the Senator from Georgia that they have in the agricultural college and in the industrial college an aggregate of a thousand students, according to the figures given by the Senator from Washington those two schools have more than $240,000 per year for their support-probably more, because I doubt whether the Senator from Washington had the industrial college in his mind when he was giving the figures. of teaching a thousand white students at a cost of $240,000 or $250,000 per year, and teaching 500 or more students of the colored race at a cost of $24,000 per year, presents a situation that to me is rather inexplicable.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will yield, I will says that the character of the instruction is utterly different. The character of the students is utterly different. They have not a boy in the negro school that could go through the college of agriculture at the university, or that could stand an examination to enter. They come there for a few months and take a trade. While the figures show 500 and odd there matriculating during the year, I do not think there are 25 that are studying agriculture. The 500 do not stay there during the year. It is the matriculation for the year that the Senator is They come in and stay awhile to take a course in saddlery, to take a course in shoemaking, to take a course in bricklaying, or to take a special course in carpentry.

I have been in close touch with men who are frequently at the school. My own impression is that the number there at one time does not reach half the number given in the figures. have provided quarters for all who would come. We have encouraged them to come.

It does not take the same expense to teach shoemaking that it does to teach higher chemistry. It does not take the same expense to teach bricklaying that it does to teach botany. We have had no applications there for any such courses of study. We have not been able even to get them to take the more advanced work in farming. We have the best farmer we can find among the negroes there, the best-trained man we could get in charge of the farm. The difference is that at one school the highest class of scientific work is done, for men who are capable of receiving the instruction and who are seeking it.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator a question, Mr.

President?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. In our school the term "mechanic arts" is not confined to the trades. I take it for granted that all the agricultural colleges—that is, colleges of agriculture and mechanic arts, or agricultural and mechanical colleges—teach many other things than agriculture and the trades. They teach civil engineering, they teach electrical engineering, they teach mechanical engineering, they teach chemical engineering. the college for colored students in Georgia teach these things?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia: I do not think it teaches any of

Mr. CUMMINS. Why? Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are no negroes to take them. There are no applicants to take them. You are dealing with an utterly different proposition. You are dealing with the masses of the negro race who are not ready for it, are not prepared for it, and are not seeking it. We are trying to reach out and serve them in the only sane way in which we can serve them. Out of our 1,200,000 negroes in Georgia, at least 900,000 of them are coal black. It is all we can do to advance them gradually, as we are seeking to advance them, beyond the condition in which we found them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am only seeking information. I know the difficulty as well as the Senator from Georgia,

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am seeking to answer the Senator

Mr. CUMMINS. But the colored children of some parts of the South are trying to get just such information as I have suggested we are imparting in the North, in some of the private A LY I HE SIGHT institutions of learning, such as that conducted by Booker Washington. Is not civil engineering taught in that college?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know. If so, I never saw a negro who was a civil engineer, and I certainly never saw one who was a chemical engineer or a mechanical engineer.

Mr. CUMMINS. What does Booker Washington teach in his

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know. I never see any of his graduates doing anything anywhere in my State. not know one of his graduates who is at work in my State. In that agricultural and mechanical college we are seeking to take hold of the great mass of the negro race in our State. We have 900,000 negroes who are rural. In our negro grammar schools we are trying to teach as many of them as we can to read and write. Few go beyond the fourth grade. We are spending each year for the negro schools, out of the money paid by the white taxpayers of Georgia, many times the amount the Government gives to these colleges. We are advancing the negroes in these schools just as well as we can and as fast as we can. Of the appropriation to the State college of agriculture, $50,000 is used to put demonstrators all over Georgia, who demonstrate to the negro as well as to the white man, and who are extremely gratified whenever they can get a negro on his own place, whether it is rented or owned by him, to take his acre and follow their directions and use the knowledge derived from participating in the demonstration.

Mr. CUMMINS. My surprise is that after all these years of educational effort the State school in Georgia open to the colored race is not able to gather students in such numbers as to require more than the expenditure of $24,000, gathered from all sources, national as well as State, to carry on the school. To me that is the most depressing information that has been developed in the course of this discussion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

In just a moment I will yield. On the very point at issue here, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that in 1912 there were in Mississippi 586 students in the agricultural and mechanical college, while in the same year the income of the colored college of Mississippi from all sources was $59,932. In South Carolina, in the same year, there were 826 students in the colored college, and the income of the college was $48,361. Not so much difference in these different Very likely the facilities afforded were in keeping with the money available.

I now yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I was interested in the argument which was presented the other day by the Senator from Georgia, and I had some sympathy with it, to the effect that the rural population of some of these Scathern States requires the assistance this bill carries. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington whether, in the distribution of the fund in this bill, it is equally divided among the white and the colored people in the rural districts of the Southern States?

Mr. President, possibly the Senator was not Mr. JONES. here during the first part of my remarks. I am trying to show that none of it will go to the colleges for the colored people, and I am basing that statement upon what has been done in the past. I do not contend that the colored people will not get some benefit from it. What I am contending is that it will go to the white colleges, to be distributed and used where only white students attend. That does not mean that no colored people will get the benefit of it, because under this bill people are to be sent out into the country; but they will be sent out by the colleges that are exclusively for white students. In other words, those who have charge of the colleges where colored students go will have nothing to say as to how this money shall be used or where it shall be used.

It seems to me, when the National Government is appropriating money for the encouragement of education, that in States where there are two colleges recognized as agricultural colleges. recognized as entitled to receive the benefits of the appropriations which we have made heretofore for agricultural colleges from the National Treasury, we should not place it in the power of the State to say that this money shall all go to or be handled by one college to which white people only are ad-

I do not contend that the negroes will not be benefited by this appropriation. I do not contend that the demonstrators you send out will not demonstrate in communities where there are colored people, and where they can get benefit from it. I do not contend that. Even if I were to admit that the colored children would get the same benefit under your bill that they would under the provision I offer, I should still think Congress ought to put in this provision, so as to show these people that we propose to see that they are treated fairly, and to give them the encouragement that must come from the fact that there is a college to which colored boys can go that will have control over a part of this appropriation, and that if they develop boys who are capable of demonstrating they will have an opportunity to go out and do it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to ask the Senator, then, if he would waste half of this fund in its beneficial effects, if intelligently administered, upon the 900,000 negroes in the rural section of Georgia, just for the purpose of shifting part of it to a place where there is nobody competent to do the demon-

Mr. JONES. Of course we have not wasted any of this money heretofore, and I do not believe it is a fact that there are no colored people or white people connected with the colleges where colored boys go that are competent to do this work. do not believe that is the condition of things, even in the State of Georgia, to which the Senator is referring.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator speaks of the white people connected with the colored college. Does the Senator really know anything, of his own knowledge, about the management of the colored college of Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. I say I do not, Mr. President. I have not visited it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator, then, is speaking out of the profundity of misinformation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Want of information. Mr. JONES. No, Mr. President; I am not going into the question as to how they are handled. I am going upon the broad proposition as to what it is fair for the National Gov-ernment to do with its money. If these institutions are so lacking in facilities for education, how, in the name of God, can you expect people to go there to attend them? It seems to me, if the National Government is going to appropriate money for any of our agricultural colleges, we ought to see to it that some of the money goes to colleges that really need it. If they have not the necessary facilities now, let us provide facilities. If they have not colored teachers, let us provide white teachers for the colored schools.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I very heartily concur with the Senator from Washington in his desire to benefit the colored man.

Mr. JONES. I do not doubt that. Mr. VARDAMAN. But I do not in the least concur with the Senator in the method by which he would do it. If the Senator would just take a few days off and study this question and inform himself as to the racial peculiarities of the negro, with which we of the South have to deal, I think, from my acquaintance with him, instead of standing in his place and criticizing the white people of the South who are carrying this burden, his attitude on this question would be entirely different. Would the Senator ask the Government to share this fund with the Japanese in California? Would he give the yellow man a voice in the disbursement of it?

Mr. JONES. I will answer that question, Mr. President. I would, if the Japanese were citizens of this country. They are not citizens of this country. I hope they never will be.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Why not? Mr. JONES. The colored people are citizens of this country, legally as well as otherwise, and we must regard them as such. I will say to the Senator, however, that I can not discuss this question upon any other basis than that. He may look at it in a different way.

Before I forget it, I want to say that I do not intend, at any rate, to criticize your people of the South, and I do not believe I am merely trying to show, from my stand-I have done so. point, what I think ought to be done with the funds the National Government is going to take out of the Treasury for the development of schools in the different States.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington further yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to ask the Senator why he is so averse to the Japanese becoming citizens and so much in favor of the negro as a citizen?

Mr. JONES. The colored man is a citizen now. I am not here to say what I think ought to have been done 40 or 50 years ago. He is a citizen, and as such he is entitled to the same rights that I am entitled to under our Constitution and under our laws

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Japanese is here.

Mr. JONES. He is not a citizen and never will be.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I agree with the learned Senator that the Japanese should not be permitted to become citizens. I am opposed to any colored race acquiring citizenship. But in all the elements that go to make up a perfect man the Japanese is vastly superior to the negro. The Senator knows that.

Mr. JONES. I do not admit it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator does not admit it?

Mr. JONES. No. Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, Mr. President, I can not argue against that kind of information. The Japanese has shown marked capacity for self-government; the negro has not.

Mr. JONES. I do not think it is necessary to admit that for the purposes of this argument.

I wish to say that I recognize the burden that the white people have in the South, and I should be glad to do anything possible to help them bear that burden, because it is a national burden. I believe this is a good way to help them bear it. They may not agree with me, and they may have better information than I have with reference to the situation. I think, however, that human beings have about the same feelings and about the same aspirations to a greater or less degree, and that about the same influences affect one that affect another, to a greater or less degree, of course; and I believe that about the same influences that will elevate and lead upward the white man will also elevate and lead upward the colored man. It may be true that the progress of the colored man will not be quite so rapid, but I think if you hold out to him hope for the future he will reach for it just as we reach for it. He may not reach for it quite so vigorously or quite so effectively as we do. believe he will reach for it, however, and I believe the development of the colored people in the South has shown it to be characteristic of them as well as of us.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?
Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WORKS. If it is an admitted fact, as stated here, that the colored man is not susceptible of education along agricultural lines, I will ask the Senator from Washington whether the National Government ought to be making an appropriation for that purpose?

Mr. JONES. I certainly do not think he should be counted to get a certain part of the fund if he is not considered capable of getting any benefit from it, but of course I would not admit that he is not capable of development in that line. In fact, I think he has shown his capacity in that respect to a very great

Mr. WORKS. I am not admitting it, either. I am simply taking the statement that comes from the other side of the

Mr. JONES. I did not intend to convey the impression that the Senator was doing so, because I was satisfied he was not.

It was suggested here a few days ago in the debate that the negro people did not want negroes sent out to teach them. My recollection is that the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr.

SMITH] suggested something of that sort.

I can not believe that to be the case. There may be some evidence of that in Georgia or in some of the other States, but it seems to me it is so contrary to the principles of human nature that we can not believe it as a general proposition. I believe the colored people like to be taught by people of their own race. I believe they like to be educated and led by peo-ple of their own race rather than by those of another race. I think that is not only in accordance with human principles and human character, but also in accordance with experience.

There are a great many colored schools in the South established and maintained by private capital. What do we find about teachers in those schools? Why, we find, of course, both white teachers and colored teachers, but we find colored teachers in a far greater proportion than white teachers.

If the negro does not like a colored teacher, why is it that these institutions employ a great many more colored teachers than white? The people who furnish the money for these different institutions are business people. They are white people. They are men of experience. They are men of wisdom. It seems to me they would use the methods that would bring the greatest good out of the money they invest. If they found among the colored people the feeling that has been suggested, that they do not want to be taught or led by their own race, they, of course, would have a great majority, if not all, of the teachers white. Yet what are the facts in that regard?

The teachers in the secondary and high schools, excluding the public high schools, in the following States, are as follows:

In Alabama there are 68 white teachers in these schools, and 440 colored teachers.

In Arkansas there are 9 white teachers, and 88 colored teachers

In Florida there are 19 white teachers, and 80 colored teachers. In Georgia there are 111 white teachers, and 227 colored teachers.

In Kentucky there is 1 white teacher, and there are 68 colored

In Louisiana there are 65 white teachers, and 97 colored teachers

In Maryland there are 5 white teachers, and 39 colored teachers.

In Mississippi there are 55 white teachers and 195 colored teachers.

In Missouri there are no white teachers, but there are 41 colored teachers.

In North Carolina there are 56 white teachers and 275 colored teachers.

In South Carolina there are 54 white teachers and 264 colored

In Tennessee there are 90 white teachers and 322 colored teachers.

In Texas there are 44 white teachers and 196 colored teachers. In Virginia there are 150 white teachers and 431 colored teachers.

It seems to me that shows that these colored students would prefer and do prefer people of their own race for teachers and leaders above those of the white race. If they did not prefer them, it seems to me the people who finance these institutions would get the teachers they did prefer.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. Certainly. Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I desire to say to him that so far as Mississippi is concerned, in all the public institutions for negroes they have negro teachers. If there are any white teachers for negroes, they are in private schools maintained by private contributions.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, that emphasizes what I am trying to bring out, namely, that we ought to have colored teachers for colored people; and if we have and insist upon having colored teachers for colored people, we ought to give them some direct benefit from the funds we are going to appropriate out of the National Treasury.

The Senator says that in the public schools of Mississippi all the teachers for the negroes are colored people. In other words, they either recognize the fact I have stated or else they force upon the colored people, against their will, colored teachers and colored leaders.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washiugton further yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The management of the schools in Mississippi in all the municipalities is under the control of a white board of trustees. There is a negro superintendent and negro teachers in the agricultural and mechanical college of Mississippi for colored students. As I said a moment ago, they are under the control, however, of the same board of trustees that control all the other educational institutions. There are a few private schools, maintained by contributions largely from the North, that have white teachers. I do not think they have negro teachers at all in those schools. There is one in Jackson and one north of Jackson, at Tugaloo, which is maintained by donations, and my understanding is that they are all white teachers; but so far as the teachers in colored schools that are provided by law in Mississippi, they are colored.

I wish to say while I am on my feet that I rather think the negro prefers a negro teacher, but I have my doubt about the negre teacher being as helpful to the negro student as the more capable white teacher.

If I may be permitted to occupy the floor in the Senator's time, I believe that it would be a very unfortunate condiof affairs if the negroes were permitted to manage their public educational institutions. I will cite an instance to sustain this view. When I was governor and president of the board of trustees of the negro agricultural and mechanical college I went down to the college on one occasion and found a repetition of one of the revolutions they have down there in Haiti. The yellow and the black members of the faculty had gotten into a race war, and when I went there and inquired about it I found it was absolutely impossible to keep order in the institution until a white secretary was provided to look after the business affairs of the institution and was put in charge of it.

I speak, Mr. President, as one who has lived with the negro all my life and who wishes him well, and who would make a greater sacrifice to-day to preserve his rights to life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness, and the enjoyment of the products of his own toil than some gentlemen who live at a distance from him, who love him as a race but who despise him as an individual. festations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There must be no manifestations in the galleries. The Sergeant at Arms will be directed to clear the galleries if it occurs again.

Mr. JONES. I do not suppose the Senator has any one particularly in mind when he makes a suggestion of that sort. think I would go just as far to help the man lying at the gate, whether he was colored or white or any other color, as the Senator from Mississippi. The fact that I happen to live in some other section of the country certainly ought not to deprive me of the right of saying some words in behalf of the people of some other sections of the country. I have endeavored as far as possible not to criticize or even to suggest that the people of the South are neglecting their duty. I do not want to suggest anything of that kind, and I have tried not to do it. I do not know why it is that such thoughts seem to be uppermost in the minds of our friends on the other side and why they seem to attribute to us something that is farthest from our thoughts in trying to solve this problem. I know it is their burden, although in a broad sense it is the Nation's problem, and I sympathize with them in it. I recognize the conditions, but not so clearly it may be as they do. Probably I do not realize the difficulties so clearly as they do, but I try to do it, and I believe I do grasp them to a certain extent. I want to do everything that I can to help them solve this problem and to bear these burdens, and I am suggesting this as one of the ways by which I believe we can help them to do it.

I believe that if we will take some of this money that we propose to take from the Treasury of the United States and guarantee that it will go to and be used by some of those colleges, or put under their control, to help develop teachers from those colleges, and help develop teachers that the Senator from Mississippi thinks ought to be teachers for the colored race, we are helping to solve this problem and that we are going forward in the solution of it rather than backward. It may be that I am mistaken and that he is right, but I do not think so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I hope the Senator from Washington will acquit me of any purpose to impute to him improper motives. do not. I believe the Senator feels that he is rather called upon to deal with this question, though his method of dealing with it would go contrary to the best opinion of the best people of the South, who have been face to face with it all these years, whose burden the Senator from Washington says it is. Yet he said a moment ago that he had never lived among them and he does not know anything about them except that which he has received from sources that I am quite sure from my own observation and experience are not reliable.

If the Senator from Washington had his way about this matter-and I do not pretend to impute to him improper motives; I think he is just as honest and just as sincere and just as patriotic and just as devoted to duty as the inquisitors were during the Spanish inquisition, who broke the bodies of the Jews on the rack and boiled dissenters, believing, as they did, that it was better, that by punishing them for a day they might be induced to recant and thereby save their immortal souls from eternal damnation-I say to him-

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator-Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator would bring about a condition in the South which would be unendurable for the white people of that section, and the civilization of the South, glorified by the genius of our fathers and consecrated with their blood, would perish from the earth.

Mr. JONES. I do not think the Senator has any right or any occasion to suggest that I am animated by the same motives and the same spirit that animated the inquisitors.

Mr. VARDAMAN. They were perfectly-honest. Torquemado was as sincere in his bloody work as Washington was in his patriotic effort.

Mr. JONES. Yes; but they had a spirit and a malignity about them that I thought was entirely foreign to me.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Absolutely. They were only trying to save humanity. They thought a little suffering in this world was justified in order to save souls from perdition.

Mr. JONES. If that is the way the Senator looks at it, of course it will be a long time before he and I will agree on these matters. I am inclined to think the Senator, probably biased by the very surroundings in his part of the country, may not be as capable of suggesting a proper solution of these matters as some others who might take a little more dispassionate view of the situation. I am trying to think that, and that, too, without questioning his motives or his honesty of purpose in his views as to how to work out this problem.

As I started to state awhile ago, there is a fund called the Jeanes fund that is formed for the education of colored people in an industrial way. I find from official sources, not from living among these people but from official sources, that they have been making quite a development in that respect; that they have been accomplishing considerable; and that there are those among them who apparently are above the ordinary mass of their race as the Senator from Mississippi is above the great mass of his race.

I have here, in the report of the Commissioner of Education, a statement with reference to industrial teachers who were educated under the fund I have referred to, and I find the fol-

The first industrial teacher was employed by the Jeanes fund in October, 1908, in Henrico County, Va.

It was a striking thing to me; it may not surprise our friend from Mississippi, but it surprised me to read this statement:

A negro woman, Virginia E. Randolph, who had taught 13 years in the county and had achieved notable success as a rural teacher, was appointed the first industrial supervisor.

She must have been capable, Mr. VARDAMAN. What State was that? Mr. JONES. In Virginia,

There were 23 negro schools in her county. The industrial teacher during the first year organized the parents into improvement leagues, and through these leagues secured very marked improvements in the conditions of the buildings and the grounds. She introduced into the schools work in cooking, sewing, mat making, and elementary agri-

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Virginia?
Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington something about that system in Virginia. I never heard of an industrial supervisor there. Mr. JONES. An industrial teacher. I believe it does say that she was appointed an industrial supervisor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I suppose she was an instructor in some colored school. I know that no colored woman has been appointed a supervisor of any sort over white schools in Virginia.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President-

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator, I suppose, has gotten hold of an account of some colored industrial school, of which there are several in Virginia, and they are doing very good work for the betterment of the colored race. They are taught by colored instructors. I have no doubt that was some colored institution with a colored woman appointed as an instructor in it; but we have no public office known as an industrial supervisor in Virginia.

Mr. JONES. I take this from the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1912, at page 119, and I stated that it was under the Jeanes fund.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes; it is under some special

Mr. JONES. A special fund. Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Dedicated to the education of colored children in their institutions.

Mr. JONES. Certainly.
Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No colored woman has been appointed a teacher or industrial supervisor or anything of that sort except in a colored institution devoted to the education of colored people, and it is very proper that they should be ap-pointed when they are qualified. Some of them, I am glad to say, are qualified to do the work in industrial institutions do voted to the education of colored people.

Mr. JONES. I would not consider it far wrong if a competent colored woman were appointed to an official position in Virginia, as far as that is concerned; but I do not think that was probably an official position. It was under this fund.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am not familiar with that particular fund, but I would differ with the Senator about appointing a colored woman to an official position to instruct white people.

Mr. JONES. Oh, I did not say instruct— Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If appointed to an official position to instruct colored people, it is all right, just as is being done in private institutions.

Mr. JONES. I did not say she had been appointed to an official position to instruct white people. I understood that the Senator from Virginia wanted to make it clear that this woman was not appointed to an official position of any kind.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is correct.

Mr. JONES. I want to say that I would not have any objection to appointing her to an official position, especially in connection with colored people, if she was competent. The report

In Virginia, where a second State supervisor of rural schools has been appointed to give his time wholly to negro schools, the negro industrial supervisors are in large measure under his control. During the past year negro industrial supervisors were employed in 117 counties in 12 Southern States.

Then it gives the numbers and the States that I will not take the time to read.

Now, with reference to their capacity for farm work and farm-demonstration work, which the Senator from Georgia seemed to think they did not do or were not capable of doing, and that colored people really do not want them as leaders, but prefer white people, I find this same report on page 249 the following:

Closely allied with the work of the Jeanes Fund and the State supervisors is that of the farm-demonstration work, which was begun by the late Dr. Knapp. This work is carried on under the direction of the United States Department of Agriculture in cooperation with the General Edu-

States Department of Agriculture in cooperation with the General Education Board.

There were 32 negro farm demonstrators in 1912, distributed among the States as follows: Virginia, 10; Alabama, 7; South Carolina, 7; Georgia, 2; North Carolina, 2; Florida, 1; Oklahoma, 1; Arkansas, 1; Mississippi, 1. In speaking of the work of these agents—

These are colored people-

Mr. Bradford Knapp said in his recent report to the general education

Mr. Bradford knapp said in his recent report to the general education board:

"I believe that it is safe to say that these, together with the negro farmers and tenants who are receiving direct instruction through white agents, will bring the total of negroes being instructed up to about 20,000."

As an illustration of the work of the negro demonstrators, Mr. Knapp describes the activities of one of them in the Wellville community, in Virginia:

I call attention to the improvement that has been brought about in that particular community under the direction and supervision of a colored teacher, or instructor, or demonstrator:

supervision of a colored teacher, or instructor, or demonstrator:

The improvement in the Wellville community under the special superintendence of J. B. Pierce is a source of great interest, and presents a showing that is little short of remarkable. Some of these negro farmers are making yields of corn from 50 to 200 per cent larger than they did formerly, and are doing it at less cost per bushel. They have become immensely interested in grass demonstrations, and some of them have produced as high as 2 tons of hay per acre, while formerly they grew no grass whatever. Seventy-five per cent of these farmers are now growing wheat and 35 per cent of them are growing oats, and the acreage has vastly increased over what it was before. They are building up their soils by the use of cowpeas, crimson clover, soy beans, rye, and buckwheat. Before the demonstration work began in this community only one crop was grown on the cornland, and the land was continuously cropped to the one crop, year in and year out. Now fully 40 per cent of the farmers with whom this work is conducted have adopted two or three year rotation of crops.

Mr. President, that simply illustrates what can be done with

Mr. President, that simply illustrates what can be done with these negro demonstrators, and that is what I would like to see done with a part of this appropriation. I believe it can be done, and I believe it will benefit the people of the South. I believe it will benefit the people of the South. I believe it will help them solve this problem. I believe that every negro farmer who can be led to increase the production of his corn or his wheat from 50 to 200 per cent is helping to solve this problem and to relieve the people of the country and the people of the South from the great burden that they have to bear. I believe that if we can have institutions established in these various States, to which these boys can go in the hope and in the knowledge that when they fit themselves they will be sent out to their race and the people of their community to help them to develop themselves as better farmers and better husbandmen, we will have this problem further along the road of a proper solution than it is now.

It was suggested a few moments ago by the Senator from Mississippi that there are negro teachers in all the negro schools and that that is the proper thing. That simply emphasizes what I insist upon, that the colored people want colored instructors, colored farm demonstrators, colored supervisors, and that the best way to solve this problem is to fit colored men to occupy those positions. Of course, if we have not negroes who are fit to occupy them now we will have to take white people, but that is no reason why we should not help them to fit themselves to take advantage of such opportunities as may present themselves. It is really a good reason why we should do this.

In line with that suggestion of the Senator, I find that legislation has been passed in some States that actually prohibits white men from teaching in colored schools. I saw in a paper just the other morning—

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?
Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to ask the Senator if he is familiar with the industrial condition of the negro in the South?

Mr. JONES. I am going to refer to that a little later on. Mr. VARDAMAN. Are you familiar with the progress they have made, industrially?

Mr. JONES. I am going to refer to that a little later on.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I say, are you?

Mr. JONES. I think so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Have they made progress?

Mr. JONES. I think they have made wonderful progress, I am coming to that in a few minutes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator, because I want him to have it in mind. I have listened with a great deal of interest to his discussion of the question, and I hope that the friction of suggestions and attrition of ideas may evolve the eternal truth which will furnish a light to lead us out of the wilderness.

Mr. JONES. I hope so.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to suggest to the Senator that it would be interesting if he would contrast or compare the progress of the negro race since 1865 with the negro in other parts of the world. If he shall go deeply into this question he will probably reach the conclusion that under the kindly guidance, assistance, and cooperation of the white man he has probably accomplished more, he has probably done better for himself, than in any other country in the world.

Unless the Senator is absolutely sure of his footing, in his desire to reach the truth and promote the welfare of the negro I would suggest that he had better be careful not to change the system under which the negro has made such progress, lest he might make a mistake and have a repetition of Haiti, or some country like that, where the negro has absolute control.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think when I go into the matter of progress I will advance about the same idea the Senator has with reference to the negro's progress. I am unfortunate in my expression if he thinks I have suggested that the white people have not done a great deal for the colored man. All I want to do is to see if we can not do a little more and do it in a better way.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I do not want to interrupt him and break the thread of his argument-Mr. JONES. There is not any thread to it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest to him that under the terms of this bill as it is, in Mississippi to-day-I do not know how it is in other Commonwealths of this Republic-a negro farmer may be selected who has intelligence above the average, who is prudent and provident, who has a little farm; they will help him to improve his farm and to show what he can accomplish. There are a great many of these experiments being made on negro farms. I'want to warn the Senator that he will commit a great mistake and he is not a kind friend of the negro if he shall give the negro control of this fund. Under this plan the work is going to be done under the direction of the Anglo-Saxon, the man of proven judgment, initiative, wisdom, and experience, and the negro men and women will get the benefit of it. They are going to do the work which will serve to develop whatever qualities they possess susceptible of development, but it is going to be done under the supervision of a superior head and a more skillful hand.

Mr. JONES. My amendment will not take away the superior head or the superior hand. I do not know whether in the colleges that have been designated as entitled to take part in the benefits of the act of 1862, where colored students attend, there is a colored board of regents, but I doubt it. Those in control, I suppose, are white people. I am not going to disturb that at all.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES. Certainly. Mr. BRADY. I have been following the line of argument of the Senator from Washington very closely and I am at a loss to understand exactly what advantage the amendment he proposes will be to the colored race of the South. In listening to the remarks of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] ator from Mississippi [Mr. Vardaman] they seem to be firmly convinced that the best way to administer this appropriation in the Southern States, where the white students and the colored students attend different schools or colleges, is to have it administered for the benefit of colored students and white students by the white men of the different States. I think that was the real intent of the first section that this amendment attempts to strike out. The first section which the Senator proposes to strike out

That in any State in which two or more such colleges have been or hereafter may be established the appropriations hereinafter made to such State shall be administered by such college or colleges as the legislature of such State may direct.

I understand that is the part of the bill the Senator proposes

Mr. JONES. I propose to strike out that provision and put in another that has been found in the other acts of Congress passed, the act of 1890 and the act of 1907.

Mr. BRADY. That is what I understand. In place of that the Senator proposes to insert the following:

That in any State or Territory in which two or more such colleges have been or hereafter may be established, or in which there has been one college established in pursuance of the act of July 2, 1862, and also in which an educational institution of like character has been established or may be hereafter established, and is now aided by such State from its own revenue, for the education of colored students in agriculture and the mechanic arts, however named or styled, or whether or not it has received money heretofore under the acts of 1862 and 1890, above referred to-

I wish especially to call the Senator's attention to this part-I wish especially to call the Senator's attention to this part—the legislature of such State may propose and report to the Secretary of the Interior a just and equitable division of the appropriations hereinafter to be made to such State between one college for white students and one institution for colored students, and thereafter the share of such college for white students in said appropriation, as determined by such division, shall be administered by such college for white students, and the share of such institution for colored students in said appropriations, as determined by such division, shall be administered by such institution for colored students.

If I understand it-and if I do not I hope the Senator will explain it, so that I may thoroughly understand it—the State legislature proposes what it considers to be a just and equitable division of the appropriation, and then, after the legislature of the State determines that in the future—"thereafter" the amendment says—"the share of such college for white students in said appropriation * * * and the share of such institution for colored students" chell be administration for colored students" chell be administration for colored students." institution for colored students" shall be administered in accordance with the report of the just and equitable distribution made by the legislature of the State. If the members of the legislature in a State where there are two colleges feel that this appropriation can be better administered by the white people, and they have absolute supervision over the entire appropriation, then it will be so administered.

one portion left for the benefit of colored students, it seems to me a division might be made that would be more detrimental to the colored students than the present bill.

Mr. JONES. I do not see how. Mr. BRADY. As an illustration, the Senator from Georgia made the statement that he believed the amount of $24,000 for the 500 colored students was in proper proportion, as I understood him, to the provision for the white students, which was several times larger than that made for the colored students.

Mr. JONES. But I do not think so. Mr. BRADY. They are the men, under your amendment, who would have to decide this,

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. BRADY. Does not your amendment say thatthe legislature of such State may propose and report to the Secretary of the Interior a just and equitable division of the appropriations?

Mr. JONES. Certainly; it must be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture before they can do it.

Mr. BRADY. It does not say so here.
Mr. JONES. Yes, it does. The Senator has not read the words "and when approved by him."

Mr. BRADY. That is the part that I should like explained.

Mr. JONES. It must be approved by him, Mr. BRADY. That is further on in the amendment? Mr. BRADY. Mr. CLAPP. The Senator has not the right amendment.

Mr. JONES. He has the wrong amendment. That is the amendment as it was first introduced, but it has been changed. It has to be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. BRADY. If the Secretary of Agriculture, even under your amendment as amended or changed, is called upon to approve a just and equitable appropriation as determined by the legislature of the State, does not the Senator believe that the Secretary of Agriculture, regardless of his political affiliation, will believe that the members of the legislature of that State know better than an individual how the fund should be appor-tioned and what should be done with it? It seems to me, after listening to the statement of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], that the action of the legislature in that State would be unanimously in favor of a distribution of the fund that would give the white men the control of the same, and I fear that if we try to force them to handle this industrial problem in a manner that they do not believe, after years of experience, to be right, that it will in the end be a detriment rather than a benefit to the colored man, and it is the colored man that we are trying to benefit and help by the passage of this law, just the same as the white man, and I believe this can be accomplished in a better way by leaving the States to handle their part of the appropriation in the manner best suited to the conditions in the different States.

Mr. JONES. He may and he may not. I do not know whether or not the Senator has heard all of my remarks, but I find that where the law does not contain a provision of that kind-for instance, the act of 1862—nearly all the money went to the white schools, and under the acts of 1890 and 1907, which contain a provision like that, but not quite so strong, I think—the approval of the Secretary was not even required, though I am not sure about that-but substantially the provision was the same as this, there was, to my mind, a fairer and fuster and more equitable division of the money, and my belief is that under my amendment there will be such a division. I have not any doubt in the world that if this provision is not incorporated in the bill every dollar of that fund will be controlled by the colleges for white students.

Mr. BRADY. I fully agree with the Senator that the question for us to decide is whether or not it would be better for us to have it so controlled-

Mr. JONES. Certainly that is true. Mr. BRADY. To leave it to the justness of the man in the South who has this problem to contend with or whether it is better for us to leave it to the Secretary of Agriculture to say whether what their legislature has determined to be a just and equitable proportion is in reality just and equitable. I do not believe any Secretary of Agriculture would override the decision of the legislature of a State as to what they thought was a just and fair distribution.

Mr. JONES. I have been spending a couple of hours in trying to show that, in my judgment, it is better to do what this amendment provides, but I may not have been able to convince the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. I fully agree with many of the statements made by the Senator from Washington. He has certainly made a very able argument along the lines proposed in his amendment.

Mr. JONES. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BRADY. I simply am asking these questions so that we may become thoroughly enlightened on this subject before we cast our votes, for I realize that this is one of the serious problems that the men in the South have to contend with, and I realize further that the people of the North are very much interested in a fair and equitable use of the fund by the different States.

Mr. JONES. I know that. Mr. BRADY. And it is our duty to see that justice is done to each and every citizen of this Union,

Mr. JONES. That is right, and that is what I want to do. Neither do we want to overlook the fact that we are taking this money out of the Federal Treasury, and we are taking it out for the benefit of our citizens. It seems to me that we, as representatives of all the people, ought to see to it that it shall be used without discrimination and as nearly as possible for the uplift and the benefit of all citizens whom it is intended to benefit, regardless of race or color.

Mr. President, I was just starting awhile ago, when I was interrupted by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Vardaman], to call attention to a clipping which I cut from a newspaper a morning or two ago, which reads as follows:

NO WHITES TO TEACH NEGRO—OTHER DRASTIC FEATURES IN BILL PASSED BY SOUTH CAROLINA HOUSE.

COLUMBIA, S. C., January 28, 1914.

The lower branch of the general assembly to-day passed on final reading the Fortner bill, prohibiting white persons from teaching in negro schools anything but the Bible, by a vote of 62 to 40.

Amendments to the measure which were adopted provide "that the provisions of this bill shall apply to intimacy of the races in houses of ill repute," and that the bill shall include "white nurses to be employed in negro hospitals or to nurse negroes at any hospital or sanitarium."

I understand that in Florida the whites are absolutely prohibited from teaching in negro schools. I understand that that is also true in Louisiana. It simply emphasizes, as I have said, the importance of the National Government, when we are appropriating money from the Federal Treasury, to see to it that a part of this fund, at any rate, shall go to those who really need it more than anybody else.

Mr. President, I have taken far more time than I expected to take, but I want to notice, for just a few moments, the question raised by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Vardaman] a moment ago, with reference to the progress of the colored race. I had cecasion some little time ago to make an investigation with reference to that subject; not by personal visitation to the section of the country where the colored people mostly are, but by looking through official reports, statistics, and so forth, I endeavored to gather information with reference to the progress of the negro race. I want to say that I was really amazed at their progress; I was amazed at what they have done during the last 50 years. I do believe that the white people are entitled to some credit for what has been done and what has been accomplished by the colored people. I have put into writing what I found and my impressions with reference to the matter, and I think it will take less time for me to read it than it would if I were to try to state it otherwise, because there might be more interruptions that way than there will be in this Fifty-three years ago there were nearly 4,000,000 human beings in this country in a state of slavery. They were bought and sold like so many sheep or cattle. They owned no property; they were nothing but property themselves. They had no business training, but for 250 years had been working for and under the direction of others. Instead of developing self-reliance, every influence affecting them tended to destroy selfconfidence, self-reliance, and individual initiative. They were given no education, but, on the contrary, to instruct them was made a crime by law. All the moral instincts of their natures were disregarded, dwarfed, and destroyed. They had no rights that anyone was bound to respect. At the close of the most bloody and terrific war in the history of the world this race, this property, became a free people. They were almost as helpless as children; they had scarcely enough clothing to hide their nakedness; they were in a country devastated by war and among former owners and masters who could not help but feel more or less unkindly toward them. Instead of looking to others for food, clothing, and shelter, they must provide for Instead of looking to A more discouraging prospect for a people could scarcely be imagined. It is a high commentary upon the generous nature of their former owners, as well as upon themselves, that they should have made such great advancement and should have reached such a friendly relationship with each other as now generally exists.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will it interrupt the Senator for me merely to make a suggestion at this point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.
Mr. VARDAMAN. In the discussion of this question I would invite the Senator from Washington to consider the condition of the negro in 1865 and contrast his condition then with the condition in which he was when the slave dealers-who, as it happened, all lived in the North—brought him to this country 200 years before. The Senator remembers that when brought here the negro had to be taught to eat cooked food; that he had to be taught a language. He was a cannibal, a worshiper of the voodoo, and under that "cruel condition of affairs" which, he described, existed in the South the Senator finds him, after 200 years, capable—as the Senator and some other people of the country who did not know so much about it thought—of governing the southern white people.

Mr. JONES. No, Mr. President; I did not suggest anything of that sort.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I said that the Senator finds the negro in that deplorable condition which he has just described when the race came out of slavery.

Wait a moment. I can not yield to the Senator Mr. JONES. from Mississippi to put into my mouth something that I did not say at all-that we found them capable of governing the south-I suggested nothing of that kind.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But they were given the right to do that under the law. Mr. JONES.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; they were given the right to vote. Mr. VARDAMAN. I was simply calling attention to that Mr. JONES. I was not justifying that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator has presented the negro as a man who had been oppressed. I want to call attention to the the 250 years of slavery the reverse is true. I am going to make this statement soberly, and I challenge contradiction—considering the negro's condition as it was when brought to this country, he made greater educational and moral progress during the 250 years of slavery than he had ever done before or since in the history of the negro race.

Mr. JONES. I want to ask the Senator a question. Is there any statement or suggestion that I have just read here that is

Mr. VARDAMAN. Except that you present him as much oppressed-

Mr. JONES. No.
Mr. VARDAMAN. That he has had no opportunity for development; that he had simply been driven as a beast of burden. I have no word of defense for slavery; had I lived in those days I should have been as much opposed to it as was Thomas Jefferson; but I want to say to you that slavery did not hurt the negro, though it was a very decided disadvantage to the owner of the slave. I repeat again, however, that no man can take the history of this country and the history of the negro race who will not find that he made greater progress, morally and otherwise, during the 250 years of slavery than he had ever done before or since in the history of the world.

Mr. JONES. Nevertheless, the negro was in the condition have just described.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think he was in that condition at all.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President-

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. JONES. Certainly. Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. As the Senator from Washington has on more than one occasion asked the question whether he had described the condition of the negro accurately, I can not fail to respond. In so far as my State is concerned the Senator has described the condition of the negro with great inac-

Mr. JONES. In what particular? I do not want to describe his condition inaccurately. I should like the Senator to point out in what respect I have been inaccurate.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That demonstrates to my mind the fact that those who live in the same communities with the negroes are better qualified to solve the negro problem than are Senators who live in remote States.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am going to ask some ques-

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am not going to occupy many seconds. I merely wish to dissent from nearly every statement which the Senator has made about the negro when he was freed in 1865.

Mr. JONES. I want to ask the Senator if it is true that negroes were bought and sold like sheep and cattle. Is that true?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They were bought and sold, but can not say that they were bought and sold like sheep and cattle. For the most part they were bought and sold in the most humane manner that was consistent with the institution of slavery

Mr. JONES. I am not condemning it; I am not even arguing it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator says they were bought and sold as sheep and cattle. I say they were not.

Mr. JONES. I always understood they were. Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I say they were not, and I was there and saw the conditions.

Mr. JONES. I should like to have pointed out to me the difference.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They were bought and sold in the most humane possible manner under which slavery existed.

Mr. JONES. Sheep and cattle are sold in a humane way. Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Wherever it was possible husband and wife were sold together.

Mr. JONES. I am not questioning that.
Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Well, stating that they were sold as sheep and cattle was intended to indicate that they were brutally dealt with.

Mr. JONES. No; sheep and cattle are frequently sold together. You sell a cow and calf together often.

gether. You sell a cow and calf together often.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I myself am not willing as a southern man, familiar with the negro and having almost an Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator has presented the negro as a man who had been oppressed. I want to call attention to the fact that instead of the negro not being helped along during and cattle. When they had to be sold in the division of estates or for one reason or another they were treated with every consideration and kindness that it was possible for human beings to show to each other under the institution of slavery.

Mr. JONES. Then, I will ask this question: I say here that they owned no property, but they were property themselves. Is not that correct?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is not correct.

Mr. JONES. I should like to have it explained, because I am glad to get some information.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Under the law they could not own property, but most of them did own some property. the custom of the country and the consideration of their masters they were allowed to own a great deal of property that would be helpful in providing them with comforts and conveniences. Their masters were the custodians of their money. They were allowed a part of their time to work for themselves, and were allowed to have the fruits of their labor. Their masters took charge of their money, took care of it, and handed it to them as they wanted it and called for it.

Mr. JONES. It is a fact, is it not, that to teach them in a great many States—I do not say in all—was made a crime by Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It was. In my State the teaching of negroes was made a crime, but I have seen my mother assemble the negro children on the plantation and teach them to read and write. From the time I could read myself I saw that work going on. The negro youth who waited on me and attended me could read and write, and when he was set free he became a minister in the church to teach religion to his fellow men. There was a very large degree of education given to the negroes by their masters and by their mistresses. As I have said, I have seen them being taught from the time I was 10 years old. I have seen my mother and the governesses who were employed to teach the white children in the family teaching the colored children, and many of them were taught to read and write, taught the Bible, and taught the principles of religion.

Mr. JONES. I have not disputed that at all here.
Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator not only disputed it, but he has called upon me to testify about it.

Mr. JONES. I mean with reference to teaching the Bible, religion, and so on.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Again, I say to the Senator that the negroes, when they were freed, were not left in a helpless condition, unable to earn a living. I will say to him that they were not poorly clad and unprovided with clothes. They were as comfortably clad, in comparison with the white people of that time, as the negroes of the present day are clad in comparison with the white people of the present day.

I will tell the Senator, too, that the negroes were not only not left in a condition unfit to earn a living, but they were trained to earn a living and were amply able to earn a living. were blacksmiths, shoemakers, harness makers, and so forth. The women were able to cut out and to make clothing. The

All of them men were skilled laborers and common laborers. had been trained to the necessity of industry and frugality, and when they were freed they were in a good condition to earn their living, and they did earn their living.

I will say to the Senator, also, that there was no hostile feeling toward the negro race. In the paper from which the Sena-tor read it was stated that they were turned adrift poorly clothed and ill provided to make a living, and that there was a certain degree of hostility in the minds of their old owners against them. The contrary was true. The kindest relations and the kindest feelings existed; they found their old masters extending a helping hand, enabling them to earn a living by paying them for their services, and helping them in every way to make their way as a freed people in the land.

I may not have caught all the points sought to be made in the paper from which the Senator was reading, but, to the best of my recollection, there was not an accurate statement in it; it was all inaccurate. I think he will find that the people who have been raised in the midst of the negroes, as I have been and as other southern Senators have been, know more about their condition, more about their characteristics, and more about their necessities than he knows, and are just as ready to extend a helping hand and as ready to alleviate the negro's condition as he is.

Mr. JONES. I am not questioning that, Mr. President.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Then, I will suggest to the Senator, if he is not questioning it, let the southern people, who have the negroes with them and have to solve the negro problem, attend to this matter, and let the Senator attend to the conditions in his own State, and things will be more equitably arranged.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, we are handling the money of the United States; we are disposing of that, and I think

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. In just a moment. I think I have a duty and a responsibility with reference to how that money shall be disposed of and how it shall be taken. Furthermore, I want to say that the Senator from Virginia has demonstrated to my mind, even far better than I have done, the necessity, the importance, and the desirability of our using some of this money in the direction suggested by this amendment. He has shown the colored man to be even far more competent than I thought him to be at the close of the war.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Undoubtedly, accepting the statement of the Senator, he was. We have aided him in his progress during the last 50 years, and we will continue to do so, and in the expenditure of any money that comes to Virginia the negro will be treated fairly, according to our judgment. We might not think that he ought to receive as much of this money as the Senator from Washington thinks, because we know how much of it he can use advantageously, and the Senator from Washington, I am sure, does not know anything about how much of this money can be used advantageously for the negro in Virginia.

Mr. JONES. That may be true; but I have my opinions about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President-The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am desirous of further information; and, with the permission of the Senator from Washington, I should like to pursue that line for a moment. It is said that this side of the Chamber is incompetent to handle this question, because we do not know anything about the negro race. I want to know whether we are to abdicate our powers and duties here because of the fact that we do not live in the midst of the negroes to the same degree as Senators making the suggestion?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. JONES. I have yielded to the Senator from Illinois, but am perfectly willing that the Senator from Illinois shall yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the Senator yielding to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Illinois to name the Senator on this side of the Chamber who said that the Senators on the other side knew nothing about the question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood the Senator from Virginia to say that we were incompetent to deal with the question, because we knew nothing about the negro race.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I asked the Senator from Washington if he had any definite, personal information on the subject, and the Senator told me he did not.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator asked me if I had personal information, but not if I had definite information.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was referring specifically to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Virginia will answer the Senator as soon as he can get the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will be glad to have the information. I had reference to the statement of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, what I said could not, except in a captious and unfair spirit, be construed as a charge that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber were not qualified to discharge their duties. I said nothing of the sort, and by no reasonable inference can such a conclusion be deduced from what I did say. I did state, what is an axiomatic truth, that those most familiar with the subject can deal with it more wisely than those who are not familiar with the subject. did say, and I repeat, that the Senators from the Southern States, reared in the midst of the negro race, living in the midst of the negro race, feeling just as much interest in that race as Senators from other sections, and perhaps more, by reason of their nearness and their association, and having greater opportunities for knowledge and consequently greater knowledge, were better able to solve the negro problem than men from communities where there were no negroes. I said that not in disparagement of Senators from other communities and without intending to charge in any sense that they were unfit to dis-charge their duties here. I said, and I repeat, that the southern Senators, living in the midst of the negroes, and having their very existence involved in the wise solution of the negro problem-for it is a great problem; it has been a menace to our civilization at times, and we are even now not free from the menace in some of the relations concerning it-I say, in view of the immense interests involved in that problem and in the midst of it, as we are, I think we are in a better position to deal with it than are Senators from remote sections of the

is what I said, Mr. President. I said it in none other than a kindly spirit; in no other way than as a fair argument based upon established facts, deducing from those facts a conclusion which I think is irrefutable. If a man can better deal with a subject when he is ignorant of it than when he is familiar with it, then I am wrong; but if familiarity with a subject, if knowledge of a subject helps the solution of the problem, then I say that southern men, assuming that they are actuated by the same patriotic purposes as men in the States where there are no negroes-I say that under those conditions southern Senators are better qualified, from superior knowledge of the conditions, to deal with the negro problem than are men from the northern States. I said that, and I said it in a fair spirit, not intimating or intending to suggest that northern Senators were not qualified to discharge all the duties ·devolving upon them as Senators here.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the permission of the Senator from Washington, I should like to continue.

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am quite certain that I did not misunderstand the Senator from Virginia, and his explanation only confirms me in my understanding. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia whether he knows that many northern Senators have more negro constituents than he has in Virginia?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I know that they have not in proportion to their numbers. There is not a northern State—

Mr. SHERMAN. May I add that probably the Senator has not weighed the statement which I made. When I speak of "constituents," I mean constituents who vote. I have more negro constituents in the State I come from than you have in Virginia; and they are just as capable of taking care of them-selves as are those in Virginia, and they are given the rights under the law and constitutional amendments which they are denied in your State, sir.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Every negro in Virginia who is qualified to vote is permitted under the law and under the practice to vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. How many of them vote in your State?
Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Every man who is qualified to vote and can come up to the desk and fill up the form that is given him.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the form? Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I would not undertake to go through all the questions, but they relate to his age, occupation, and other ordinary matters which a man who can read and write can understand. If he can read and write and has the ordinary intelligence that goes with the knowledge of reading and writing, he can qualify to vote in Virginia. in Virginia, when they are qualified to vote, are permitted to vote. I know nothing about the qualifications in the Senator's State; but there is an educational qualification in Virginia, or what amounts to an educational qualification, applicable to the whites and negroes alike. There is no discrimination or distinction of any sort or kind whatever, but every negro in Virginia who is 21 years of age, and is not an idiot or a lunatic, can vote if he has the educational qualifications that are required of white men.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now renew the question-I have not the information yet-how many negroes vote in the State of Virginia, which the Senator represents in part?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not know the number of negro voters in the State of Virginia.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought possibly, with the knowledge the Senator possesses of the racial lines in Virginia, that he might give me that information.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I would not be able to make a statement as to the number; but I say we have an educational qualification such as exists in most of the Northern States. I am told, for instance, by a friend sitting near me, that Massachusetts has substantially the same requirement. Negroes are not excluded from voting in Virginia if they are qualified to vote. Exactly the same test is applied to them that is applied to the white man, it is justly and impartially administered, and no negro fails to vote who is qualified to vote and desires to

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to ask the Senator from Virginia whether as many as 40,000 negroes vote in the State of Virginia? In Kentucky, across the river from where I live.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have told the Senator frankly that I do not know the number, and I am not going to be crossexamined about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say that twice as many negroes vote in the State of Illinois as are permitted to vote in the State of

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That may be so. You may permit them to vote without being qualified, or it may be that they are better qualified. I am not responsible for anything that goes on in Illinois; but I say that Virginia does treat the negro fairly.

and he votes if he is worthy of voting.

Mr. JAMES. And if the Senator from Virginia will pardon me, I want to say that as many negroes vote in Virginia under the provisions of their law as would vote in Massachusetts, if the same number were there, under the provision of their law. In other words, both States have an educational qualification as a condition to the right of suffrage.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is peculiarly within the province of State legislatures to prescribe the qualifications of voters, if the Senator from Washington will permit me to trespass a little further on his time. Mr. JONES. Ceri

Certainly. Mr. SHERMAN. I am not complaining about that. I do not know whether or not you have any further provisions, such as the payment of a poll tax and a "grandfather clause," in addition to possessing a collegiate education, in Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say to the Senator that he is inaccurate in that, as he is in almost everything else. A collegiate education is not required in Virginia, and I can not imagine where the Senator got such an idea.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there any "grandfather clause," or is the payment of a poll tax required?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There is a requirement that a poll tax shall be paid, which is applicable to white and colored alike. It is a very small tax, and the man who does not choose to pay it or is not able to pay it has no business voting. It is a dollar and a half a year.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington ield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. LODGE. As the Senator from Virginia is so extremely accurate this afternoon, I think he had better be accurate when he speaks about Massachusetts. We have, and have had for the last 60 years, the qualification of reading and writing for all voters, but we have no poll-tax qualification, so it is not identical.

Mr. JAMES. Do you have any property qualification?

Mr. LODGE. No

Mr. JAMES. They have to read and write, though? They have to read and write.

Mr. LODGE.

Mr. JAMES. Yes

Mr. LODGE. But it appears that here there is a poll tax in addition. This is merely in the interest of accuracy, about which we have heard so much this afternoon.

Mr. JAMES. Certainly; but I was wondering why the Senator from Illinois did not jump on the State of Massachusetts for having an educational qualification. His objection is not as to the payment of the poll tax, because that is merely $1.50 a year and it is applied alike to all; but there is an educational qualification in the State of Massachusetts, and was for many years before Virginia or any of the Southern States ever had such a law.

Mr. LODGE. The law was passed in the fifties-about 1853. I think.

Mr. JAMES. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. But I did not know the Senator from Illinois was "jumping" on any State that had an educational qualification.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts correctly understood me. I am forbidden by the rules of the Senate to reflect on any State. I have too great respect for such sovereignties to reflect on them. I am only inquiring for information as best I can, so that I may be able at some time to vote on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JAMES. That is what I thought, and that is the reason called the Senator's attention to Massachusetts, a northern

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; and then I made the further inquiry about poll-tax regulations, and I find that the State of Virginia possesses a poll-tax qualification, and unless the voter can produce satisfactory evidence of the payment of that tax, by way of receipt or otherwise, he is barred from voting. Probably the Senator from Kentucky knows whether that is a qualification

Mr. JAMES. It is not. There is no such qualification as that in Kentucky, and practically 75,000 to 100,000 negroes walk up to the polls and vote at every election in Kentucky. There is no qualification required, educational or otherwise; nor is there any requirement as to paying a poll tax, nor any property qualifica-tion, the only condition to the right to vote being that the voter shall be 21 years of age and a legal resident. If the Senator wants information about Kentucky, it is a very great pleasure for me to give it to him.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I want it; and I am glad to know that Kentucky is so much more progressive than Virginia-Mr. JAMES. What about Massachusetts?

Mr. SHERMAN. Or Massachusetts; I was going to add that. Wait until I get through.

I want some further information, that I hope will be furnished me, if the Senator from Washington will allow me to trespass a little further on his time.

Mr. JONES. I yield. Mr. SHERMAN. The There will be a literacy test up here some day on an immigration bill, and in voting on that we shall have an opportunity to apply to those coming from foreign countries the same high standard of intelligence that we apply to negroes in Virginia and elsewhere.

I wish to pursue the inquiry a little further and to ask if the condition so glowingly portrayed by the Senator from Virginia and also the Senator from Mississippi as to the great progress made by the negro in slavery days does not indicate that the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments are a radical and gross governmental error?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator address that question to me?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. Mr. VARDAMAN. I think, so far as the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments are concerned, that they are—that is, the fifteenth amendment particularly, and part of the fourteenth.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the information I desire.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia seems to think we are trying to solve the whole problem by this bill.

I do not so understand it. The only question in my mind is as to what is the best course to be taken by the National Government with reference to the particular fund we are asked to appropriate for the purpose of assisting agriculture, and what would be the best way to use this fund in its distribution in the sections of the country where they have this problem, which is a national problem, too, so far as that is concerned. Leaving all the rest of the problem for them to work out and solve, I really can not understand why there is this enthusiasm with reference to propositions that I think are not actually involved in this bill at all. Much of the suggestions and discussion is, in my judgment, far afield from the real issue.

I shall now proceed with reference to the condition of the colored race at the close of the war, and I shall endeavor to show the progress it has made since. I may not be entirely accurate, in the minds of some of my friends on the other side, with reference to each individual of the colored race. I notice that they make suggestions here that are a little different from mine; and yet they are not, taking them as a class, contrary to what I believe to have been the condition of these people. may have been a few of them who could read and write, but the great mass of them could not read and write, and it is a fact that in many States it was made a crime by law to teach them to read and write. When I made that statement, however, of course I did not intend to convey the impression that not one of them could read and not one of them could write, but I applied it to them as a whole, and that is the sense in which I am going to use other references to them and what they have accom-

Four million ignorant, helpless, childlike, freed chattels have increased to 10,000,000 citizens, who are now represented in all walks of life and who are advancing in industrial pursuits, in education, and in moral growth with amazing strides. A statement of the facts is more eloquent than any panegyric that could be uttered.

From the most reliable information that I can secure, I find that they own property of the value of nearly $1,000,000,000. They have accumulated over $50,000,000 worth of church property and have erected about 20,000 churches, with a seating capacity of six or seven million. About 2,000,000 of their children are attending the public schools, and over 40,000 are attending higher institutions of learning. Over 30,000 are teachers, and a thousand or more hold life certificates. Twenty-eight thousand are learning trades, and several thousand are pursuing classical, scientific, and business courses. They have more than 150 institutions of higher learning, with 300,000 volumes in their libraries. About 2,000 of their race are physicians, 1,600 are lawyers, and there are more than 500 newspapers and magazines under their management. They have over 150 insurance companies, over 60 banks, 325 drug stores, 25,000 grocery and supply stores, and thousands of representatives in all the trades and vocations of life.

I hope in making these statements as to what the negro owns I am not in any way reflecting upon his southern white neigh-

Wholly ignorant when the war closed, fathers and mothers could not teach their children. For many years there were few, if any, public schools to which they could go; but more and more the public-school system has been made available to them, and over $16,000,000 have been contributed for educational purposes through their churches.

The wonderful results are shown by the statistics available from census reports. In 1860 they were practically all illiterate; in 1870, 79% per cent were illiterate; in 1880, 70 per cent were illiterate; in 1890, 56% per cent were illiterate; in 1900, 44% per cent were illiterate; and in 1910 only 301 per cent

These figures are taken from census reports. At this rate of progress it will not be long until illiteracy will be practically unknown among them. I earnestly hope they will continue to improve in this respect until every one of school age and over can read and write. Education is the sesame that will unlock the door of progress and happiness to them, as it has to all those who have availed themselves of its benefits, and I want this legislation to be fair, just, and helpful to them in every possible way.

It is natural that these people should be social in their habits and inclinations. The lives of their ancestors, when slaves, developed the social instinct as a part of their natures. They like to be together, and it is natural that the cities and city life should attract them. The excitement, companionship, closer associations, and entertainments attract them and their boys and girls as well as those of our race, and we find them congregated in the cities in large numbers. It is very gratifying to me, however, to find that there is a tendency to go to the soil and that the negro race in increasing numbers are becoming owners as well as tenants of farms. I hope this legislation will accelerate this movement.

The owner of land is the only real free man, the only man who can act with independence. The lawyer's clients may quit him at any time, and he can not help himself nor compel them to make use of his services. The doctor's patients may leave him and go to another without asking his consent. When the preacher's term expires his flock may hire another, and he can not complain. The day laborer can not compel anyone to employ him nor continue his employment after he is discharged. landlord can be compelled to renew a lease when the term of his The owner of land, however, can not be deprived of it without his consent. He can leave it and go back to it when he will. He can plant such crop as he may desire. When the year expires he need ask no one for permission to farm it the next year. With a little house on it, he need not worry for shelter, and with industry and thrift he need not worry about something to eat; but he can make things reasonably pleasant, and always have the real joy that comes from a good appetite, a healthy body, and a mind free from worry.

Of the 6,361,502 farms operated in 1910, 75 per cent were operated by native whites, and 920,883, or 141 per cent, were operated by colored farmers. From 1900 to 1910 colored farmers increased 19 to per cent. The value of lands and buildings of white farmers increased during the 10 years ending 1910, 122.6 per cent, while those of the colored farmers increased 136.7 per cent. The size of the farms of the whites decreased, while the size of the farms of the colored people increased. While the farms of the whites are larger, the improved lands of the colored people increased 65 per cent, while the improved lands of the whites increased only 39.4 per cent.

Of course, I understand that with the percentage basis we can make a better showing, and yet nobody ought to object to a good showing on behalf of the negro race. It seems to me we ought to rejoice at the showing they have made. Of course, a small percentage for the white people means more in acres than a large percentage for the colored race, as far as that is concerned; but I am not quoting this to reflect upon the white people, but for the purpose of showing what the negro people have done.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not so understand it. wish to ask a question. Those farms are all in the South, are they not?
Mr. JONES. Yes; I think so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And this progress is made under our plan of handling the negro in the South, and our treatment of Yes; that is true.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what I wanted to bring out. Mr. JONES. What I hope for is to get greater progress, to get an improvement on the present plan. I have not understood that all the Senators on the other side are standpatters, that they do not want to improve on conditions, but I want to help them to improve this condition. I am not saying that they are not helping the negroes, but I think we can help them more, and I want to help my friends on the other side to help them

I hope no one on the other side will think I am charging you with not helping the negro or not trying to help him, but I want to help him a little more and I want to help you to help him a little more. That is what I want.

In the State of Virginia there were 32,228 colored farm owners in 1910, owning about 1,381,223 acres, or about onetenth of the acreage owned by the whites, and of the value of over $28,000,000. In the United States there were 218,467 colored farm owners in 1910, or an increase of over 30,000 during the last 10 years. They own over 15,600,000 acres of land, as against 13,300,000 in 1910, and of the value of over $272,000,900, as against $106,600,000, or an increase of over 100 per cent. Now, very likely the development brought about by our white friends down there has had much to do with that increase.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can the Senator tell us what proportion of that land, or those farms, is right in the South-in the States we represent?

Mr. JONES. Why, I think they are all there-possibly not all, however.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Practically all?

Mr. JONES. There are some in my State; but practically all of them are in the South.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Practically all?
Mr. JONES. Why, to be sure.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is what I wanted to bring out. Mr. JONES. I do not want to suggest the opposite; not at all. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I simply wanted that fact brought out.

Mr. JONES. Farm tenants increased from 552,401 to 670,474. I hope this means that these tenants will soon become, by their thrift and industry, owners of these farm lands.

Without homes, without churches, and without organizations of any kind when released from the shackles of slavery, they have demonstrated the virility of their race not only by the increase in numbers from four to ten millions, but by the extent to which homes have been established, churches erected, schools patronized, and the adoption of those systems of organization which characterize the civilization of the day, it being estimated that more than one-third of their people belong to these organizations at this time.

Mr. President, it seems to me that a people who have made a progress like that, under the conditions and under the circumstances existing, are entitled to all the help and all the encouragement possible. As I have said, I know that their friends in the South who are with them, of a different race, are doing what they can to assist in this progress, this growth, and this development. I am willing to concede that possibly by reason of their familiarity with the surroundings and condi-tions and characteristics and habits of these people they are better able to solve this great problem than I am; but we are not endeavoring to solve all of the problem by this legislation. We are endeavoring by this legislation to help you people solve the problem that confronts you. We are endeavoring to assist you in carrying the burden that is peculiarly your burden, but which is in fact the burden of the whole Nation. We are proposing to take money from the Treasury of the United States: and I think it is our duty, regardless of where we come from, to do what we can to put that money to the best possible use to accomplish the purposes desired.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me a moment—the Senator's purpose, as I have said before, may be wholly patriotic and altruistic; but I wish to say to him, and I do not think I am biased, that he is helping us just about as effectively and just about as disastrously as if he should undertake to light us through a dark powder house with a flaming torch. He is simply handling something that he does not understand, and instead of helping the white man and helping the negro in the solution of this problem, he is multiplying the difficulties.

Mr. JONES. Did the provisions of the act of 1890 and the act of 1907 multiply the difficulties that confronted you in working out this problem? I address that inquiry to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. To what acts does the Senator refer? I do not recall.

Mr. JONES. They are the acts appropriating a certain amount of money for the support of these agricultural colleges, that had in them substantially the same provision that I am offering in this amendment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; I do not think they have the same provision that the Senator offers.

Mr. JONES. Yes; they have substantially the same provision.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think so.

Mr. JONES. It is almost word for word the same.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If so, they have not been executed as the Senator would have this provision executed.

Mr. JONES. Why, yes, Mr. President; the manner in which they have been executed is one of the strong arguments I have for this amendment. Under this provision in those laws 28 per cent of the money went to these schools instead of 8 per cent under the act of 1862.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, it is the difference in the way in which this work is to be done that makes the entire distinction that we draw between the former act and this; and to sustain that requires the whole scope of discussion that I hope to present when the Senator takes his seat

Mr. JONES. I had about concluded, Mr. President.

The Senator from Mississippi refers to the bias I have in this matter. I do not believe I have shown any more bias than he has shown with reference to the matter. Probably he has more bias growing out of the more intimate knowledge he has of the situation than I have. Of course, however, that has nothing to do with the merits of the proposition.

I do not believe I shall take the time of the Senate further. We have branched off into a great many matters that it does not seem to me-although I may be mistaken-are really involved in this question. The question is simply, What is the wise way to provide for the distribution of this money that we are going to take from the Federal Treasury for the agricultural development of the country?

I believe that in those States where it has been shown in the past that the State legislatures control or are permitted to control the disposition of this money, they have given it to institutions devoted entirely to the education of white students. Even if this is a different character of work from that in which they are engaged, I believe we should see to it that a part of this money shall go to the colleges that have been recognized under the former acts of Congress as the proper colleges to receive the funds that the National Government has heretofore do-Part of this money should go to those colleges, and be distributed by them. I do not ask that the agencies of distribution shall be interfered with, but that the money shall be distributed by the agencies provided by the State. In that way we shall offer encouragement to the colored race in the solution of this problem, which is a serious one; and we shall see to it that the money Congress appropriates out of the Treasury of the United States is used for the uplifting of those who really need help, encouragement, and assistance.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall not question the motives of anyone who differs with me with reference to the proper mode of handling this fund, but I do think I am probably in a better position than the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] to understand how the fund can be best used in my own

We have in Georgia more negroes than are found in any other State of the Union. We have 1,176,000 negroes in our State. How to move forward the great mass of the negroes is our serious problem.

The reason why those of you from other States do not understand the situation is that the great mass of the negroes are entirely different from those you see as waiters downstairs. In 1865, when they were freed, those who were old enough to work had been taught to work. Many of them had been taught trades. Many of them had been taught how to farm well and how to care for stock. Relieved of enforced labor, it was but natural that the tendency should be to avoid labor, not so much among the old as among the young who had never been made to

To-day we have in Georgia 900,000 negroes who fall under the class of rural population. We have something more than 200,000 who fall under the urban class. The large majority of the negroes of the State still need the stimulus and the training that may induce them to work for more than is necessary to meet their immediate wants, and instill in them a desire to save something, and to work more hours than are absolutely necessary to clothe and feed themselves.

There are a few, a small percentage, such as you see here, a small percentage of the more advanced in the cities, that are making admirable progress; but our problem is not with that class. It is with the great majority, 75 per cent, that it is diffi-

You can go to a county in Georgia during court week and see three negroes to every white man, coal-black negroes from the farm, full-blood Ethiopians, and it is difficult to move them to work beyond what is absolutely necessary and what they are almost forced to do in order to live.

Now, Mr. President and Senators, just a word with reference to the distribution of money. I still use the figures with regard to my own State. The negroes pay in State taxes $173,497 in all. That is the amount they pay to what we call our State tax fund. The balance is paid by the white people. With absolute control of the State, we appropriate out of this very fund, in round figures, $650,000 a year toward the education of the negroes. We appropriate toward their education nearly 400 per cent more than they pay in all to State taxes.

I mention this to show that there is not an unwillingness on the part of the white people to help the negro. I mention this fact only as it bears upon the question we have before us in order that I may, at least in a measure, remove any misapprehension in regard to our feeling toward the negro.

I desire now to call your attention to our system of farming in Georgia. We have practically no negro labor hired for wages on the farm. Ninety-five per cent of the negroes who are on the farms of Georgia work for a part of the crop.

The white man's profit from his land must come from the good work done by the negro on the farm.

I do not mean that a majority of our farms are worked by To-day more than half the agricultural product of Georgia is the product of white man's muscle on the farm. But of the negroes who work on the farm, and over 900,000 are connected with farm life, 95 per cent work for a part of the crop, and the white man's profit from his lands depends upon the proficiency of the negro farmer. How do they work? Principally under a system which we call cropping. The white man owns a farm large enough to divide up into perhaps a dozen small farms. I take that as an average. He locates a negro family on every one of those small farms, and in many instances you will find they have been working the same farm that they are on for 10 or 15 years.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon a question purely for Mr. CLAPP. information?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. About 50 acres; perhaps less. On some of the best farms the owner of the land has a common pasture, or two or three common pastures, in which all their cattle go to graze; but 40 to 50 acres make about the average.

The owner of the land, of course, picks the very best negroes he can get to take his land. He frequently requires them to keep a cow. He requires them, as a part of their contract, to raise their own hogs, to keep their poultry around the house. to plant perhaps a few fruit trees, or to take care of them if they are there. There is a vegetable garden for their own house. The interest of the owner of the land is in the staple crops-cotton, probably, and corn; in some sections wheat, and Those are the crops that the tenant cultivates in some, oats. on shares. Sometimes in his contract he is required to cultivate a vegetable garden solely for himself, and is required to keep a cow and raise his own meat. The landlord gets his profit.

Mr. CLAPP. For further information—

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly. Mr. CLAPP. What proportion, as a rule, does the landowner

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was just going to give it to you. Under that arrangement, if the landowner furnishes the stock and the agricultural implements, the animals, and so forth, necessary to make the crop, and pays for half the commercial fertilizer, and advances to the negro his food supplies if he needs them, the landlord receives one-half the cotton or corn or other staple crop.

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator speaks of an advance. That is paid back by the tenant?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The advances are paid back. Anything advanced for the tenant to eat is paid back. When the landlord furnishes the stock he frequently pays half the food required for the stock. He meets half of that expense and half the expense of the fertilizers. That is the plan upon which I should say 75 per cent of the negroes farm who farm in Georgia. A part of them own their own stock and their own supplies, and then the contract is one-third of the cotton or one-third of the corn or one-third of the oats.

Now, what is the interest of the white landowner? The only way he can make anything is for that negro to farm well, or fairly well, and the better the negro can farm the more the white landlord receives for the use of his land. He looks after and directs his dozen farms and encourages the negro tenant to work. He perhaps keeps a little farm of 50 acres around his own house, and plants a few acres in cotton and corn and wheat and oats for his own use; but the profit from his land comes from the net return that the negro must bring from the soil. That white landowner has every inducement to encourage his negro tenant to learn how to farm well.

From 1865 to 1880, speaking of my own State, we lapsed into the most careless and slovenly manner of farming. trol had passed off from negro labor, and but few white men were then engaged in actually working upon farms. The negro naturally became more and more careless, as he forgot the enforced labor which slavery placed upon him. The change came for the better in about 1880, when more intelligence began to take hold of the negro and there was on his part more willingness to work, and improved methods to a certain extent began to be adopted.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I interrupt the Senator long enough to ask him

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the argument he is now making can not with equal force and effect be applied to every employer of labor and his laborers; that the employer says the conditions under which they work are the best possible, and they have no business to complain? Is not that conclusion necessarily to be derived from the Senator's argument?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all, I think. The argument I am making is that 75 per cent of the white landowners in the State get their sole profit from a portion of the negro farmers' production, and therefore if they can add 25 per cent to the capacity of the negro the landowner will get 25 per cent more return.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is the Senator arguing in favor of a permanent landlord and tenant system?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no; I do not mean that at all. I am just discussing the existing conditions to show that the white men of Georgia who own the land are directly interested in using this farm demonstration work to improve every negro farmer they can possibly reach. What I am leading to is that there is every possible inducement to the white men to stimulate the negro to use the advantages of this demonstration work, and that this demonstration-

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that under the improved method of farming in Georgia the productive qualities have been increased at least 50 per cent in the last 25 years, and that is the case all through the South,

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is undoubtedly true. The only proposition I was seeking to urge upon Senators who doubt the soundness of the proposed plan to use this fund was, first, that the white farmers of Georgia have every incentive to use that plan of demonstration work which will improve to the greatest extent the capacity of the negro farmer to produce good crops.

Mr. President and Senators, I wish to refer to the two colleges in Georgia-the agricultural college located at the university of the State and the agricultural and mechanical school located near the coast, which is used for the negroes. I wish to repeat what I said before—that we have been able to do very little, that we have been able to get scarcely any negroes at the agricultural college who wish to take agriculture and make it a specialty. The result is that that institution, on account of the aversion of the negroes who went there, has been shaped chiefly to a plan of short courses to meet what they seemed to want, and it is almost exclusively a mechanical school to train negroes in mechanical lines. It has gone in that direction on account of the pressure from those who wish to come to it and wish to be given that kind of instruction. We have a good man at the head of it. All the teachers are negroes. We have adopted the policy in the State in all the negro schools and places of instruction where negroes are the pupils to equip the school with negro teachers. I believe that was wise. I was chairman of the board of education in Atlanta when we pressed through, at the instance of some of our best negro preachers, the exclusion of whites from competition with the negroes in the teachers' examinations and gave those places in the schools to negroes

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. ROOT. What is the control of the institution for colored people above the teachers-the board of trustees?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is a special board of white men, who are trustees, who look after it, and who feel the deep-est interest in it, and who dissuaded me from pressing legislation to change the nature of the institution. They simply said I was interfering, and I did not understand it as well as they did; that they had brought it out; that they had started with the views with which I had started when I felt a part of the responsibility as governor of the State. I had an idea that if we would press agriculture into that school we would make it a normal agricultural school; we would get more well-trained negro teachers for our negro rural schools. They convinced me that a large majority of the negroes preferred mechanical training and that I would lessen the value of the school if I pressed my views. I yielded to their advice, as they spoke from experience, not simply from theory. The fact is that scarcely any of our negroes who get beyond the negro rural schools want to stay on the farm or study agriculture.

Mr. CLAPP. If the Senator will pardon an interruption-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. That I may be clear upon this subject, I read this provision of the bill:

That in any State in which two or more such colleges have been or hereafter may be established the appropriations hereinafter made to such State shall be administered by such college or colleges as the legislature of such State may direct.

That is applicable to Georgia—that is, there is more than one college that this fund might be administered by?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.
Mr. CLAPP. And one of those is a colored college?
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.
Mr. CLAPP. Now, without asking the Senator what he

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will tell the Senator frankly what we will do. We will put it in our white agricultural college. We would not appropriate a dollar in Georgia to undertake to do extension work from the negro agricultural and mechanical school. It would be a waste of money. We have in our State college of agriculture a great dean. He was a Canadian. He We have in our State has been connected with the agricultural college of the State of Missouri and is a man of great power and zeal in his work. We have gathered the ablest faculty we could obtain from Wisconsin, from Iowa, from Missouri, from different parts of the United States, men who are scientific students of agriculture. and we want to have this work done in the very best possible way. If we tried to handle a part from the negro school, while I suppose the board of trustees would control it, we could not handle it effectively.

Mr. CLAPP. Then the enator would not expect that under the bill any of this fund would be administered through the colored college?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I would not.

I merely wanted the Senator's view.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am just as candid with the Sen-We should handle it where we can ator about it as I can be. handle it best. When we handle it best we handle it best for the negro as well as for the white man in the State. We have a great corps of scientific students at the college of agriculture. There is a great corps of scientific students in the Agricultural Department. You have not a negro scientist in the list. are not going to fill up your Department of Agriculture here with negroes, because they are black. You are not going to say that their work, where the negro is to be benefited, must be done by the negro, because you can not do it. We could not have filled properly in our agricultural college from within the State of Georgia the professorships. We have gone outside of the South to get men who are scientists, and have given them chairs in our agricultural college.

Mr. CLAPP. But I understand the Senator to say that the board of control—that is what we would call it; I do not know what it is called in Georgia-having charge of this colored college is composed of white men.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but who are the real students of agriculture in Georgia? Who are analyzing the soil in Georgia? It is being done at the university, at our agricultural college. Who are making soil surveys in Georgia? It is done from our agricultural college. Who are analyzing plants that are being raised in Georgia? Our agricultural college men, our chemists, and our masters of the subject are found at the State college of agriculture.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit an interruption for a moment, I should like VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from to ask the Senators on the other side if there are any members of the colored race doing any special work of the character designed under the bill in any of the Northern or Western States? Are they chosen because of their race for that work?

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I am not on the other side, and I do not like to interfere with any family row, but I should like to say, for the information of the Senator, that I read an item the other day which interested me. It was published pretty generally, and stated that the best farmer in the South, the most successful farmer, the one who gathered more crops off his land than any other man in the South, or in the West, for that matter, where I live, or in America, is an old negro down

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not believe there is a word of truth in that item.

Mr. LANE. I was simply going to—
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not yield to the Senator any further, Mr. President. I want to go on with my remarks.
Mr. LANE. Very well.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have some very good negro farms in Georgia. There are a few where you find a very capable negro farmer, who owns a piece of land of his own. We have negro farmer, who owns a piece of land of his own. We have several quite large negro farms in the State; but the only place we have any scientific knowledge on the subject of farming, the only organization in the State that can intelligently handle this fund, is the State College of Agriculture. We separated the mechanical branch from it. We established a mechanical branch, known as our Technological Institute, and devoted our agricultural college exclusively to the study of agricultural

You speak of this money being spent with them. Why, it is not spent with them; not a dollar is spent with the college; not a dollar is used to help the college. We simply take the students of agriculture who are most competent in the States to direct our demonstration work throughout the State. Just now, to stop a moment, I am going to send a letter to the desk, furnished me by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], which I desire to have read.

Mr. CLAPP. I will wait until the letter is read.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, the Senator may ask his ques-

Mr. CLAPP. What I want to get at is this: Of course, this is an appropriation of money that is gathered into the Federal Treasury from all over the country. Does not the Senator from Georgia feel that, if the necessity could be shown, as the Senator from Georgia is showing it now, of administering this fundtaking his State as an illustration-through the white college, it would be perfectly safe to leave the determination of that matter to a member of the Cabinet of this Republic, especially in view of the fact that we are appropriating Federal funds?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Cabinet officer did not know more about it than some others who have expressed themselves, I should say no. It is not a place for debate. We are not appropriating a dollar to be administered in Georgia through the negro agricultural and mechanical college.

Mr. CLAPP. No; because you are appropriating there the money of the taxpayers of Georgia; but I will be frank about this matter. It does seem to me, inasmuch as we are appropriating Federal money, that there should be some final Federal authority that might act as something of a check in the disposition of these funds within the State, subject to the advice of men like the Senator from Georgia and other residents of the State as to what was the wisest course to be pursued within the State.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill provides that a plan for the work must be submitted by the college of agriculture to the Department of Agriculture here and receive the approval of the Secretary of that department, or else for the next year not a Secretary of that department, or eise for the lext year not a dollar can be drawn from the Public Treasury.

Mr. CLAPP. That is the plan for the detail work.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If it were seen that the plan of work did not do the negroes justice, the power would be there to entirely stop it. Mr. CLAPP. W

Mr. CLAPP. Well, but if it were seen that, owing to any possible prejudice—although I do not think it is in the mind of the Senator-the administration of this entire fund due to any one State was being administered through one college when a portion of it ought to be administered through another college, it does seem to me that, dealing with Federal funds, we should reserve somewhere in the Federal Government some check upon the legislature of the State. Under the Senator's own statement, while it would be most improbable, of course, in Georgia, the legislature of that State could administer this fund through the colored college under the terms of the act.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would be impossible.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would be impossible to so administer it if they tried.

Mr. CLAPP. Well, if that be true, then no Cabinet officer would attempt to administer it. The point I am making and the objection I am making to this clause is, that we are dealing here with a Federal appropriation. I did not want to get into this debate. I have asked three or four questions for information, which the Senator from Georgia so kindly gave; but, while I am on my feet, if the Senator will pardon me, dealing here with a Federal appropriation, it does seem to me, I repeat, that there ought to be somewhere in the Federal Government a final authority with reference to the administration of that fund through the different colleges where there is more

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The amendment of the Senator from Washington goes far beyond the suggestion of the Senator from The amendment of the Senator from Washington requires the fund in part to be administered through both. I am sure that no Secretary of Agriculture would ever require it to be administered through both if it were left to him.

Mr. BRADY and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. To whom does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Idaho, who was first on his feet.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, the remark of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Clarr] brings us back to the very question that I raised when I interrupted the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], and that is that I do not believe, if this amendment shall be passed in its present form, it will materially aid the conditions in any way.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It will take the whole benefit of the fund away from the negro if you let the demonstration work be done through the negro college.

Mr. BRADY. The purpose of this bill is to assist in demonstrations in agriculture, and our aim and purpose is to do the greatest good to the greatest number. According to the state-ment of the Senator from Washington, the schools in the South attended by the colored people and the colored people them-selves have made wonderful progress under the system as administered by the States at the present time. There is no question about that.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President— Mr. BRADY. Just a moment.

Mr. JONES. I did not state that any school had made wonderful progress. It is the colored people themselves who have made the progress

Mr. BRADY. Well, the colored people themselves have made that progress under the system now in vogue in the Southern States. There is no question about that. We may disagree with our friends from the South as to their treatment of the negro with reference to the ballot, but I can not bring myself to believe that they do not intend and are not trying to help the negro race to become more efficient and better citizens and to improve their condition. We are proposing to pass here an amendment in which it is stated:

The legislature of such State shall propose and report to the Secretary of Agriculture a just and equitable division of the appropriation hereinafter to be made to such State between one college for white students and one institution for colored students, and when approved by him.

That is, the Secretary of Agriculture-

the share in said appropriations as determined by such division, of such college for white students, shall be administered by such college for white students, and the share in said appropriations as determined by such division of such institution for colored students shall be administered by such institution for colored students.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Georgia whether he does not believe that, according to the terms of this amendment, the State would have a right by its legislature to recommend, propose, and report to the Secretary of Agriculture just how the funds should be divided? That is what the amendment says. Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; it requires a division of some sort between the two.

Mr. BRADY. Of some sort; but, for instance, we will say that your legislature in Georgia, after due deliberation and investigation, should honestly decide that you should give 99 per cent of it to the white college, to be administered in a manner for the benefit of the colored students or in any manner that you might see proper. I want to ask the Senator whether that you might see proper, I want to ask the Senator whether he does not believe, under this amendment, that the Secretary of Agriculture would approve that plan, believing that your people best understood the conditions?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Unless he felt that he was obeying the spirit of the legislation, I think he would feel that he was disregarding the legislation. I think if that was what was bill?

meant by the legislation, nothing of the sort ought to be in the legislation.

I tell you frankly anything that we paid through the agricultural and mechanical college for agricultural extension work we would consider so much wasted. I do not say that the State college of agriculture will not use in the counties negroes as assistant demonstrators, but I have no idea that they will put a negro in charge of the work in any county. We have not, of course, a negro superintendent of education in any county. We have a white superintendent of education in every county.

Mr. SMOOT. Have you one capable of filling that position?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Of county superintendent?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No negro could fill the position of superintendent of the whites as well as of the blacks of the State.

Mr. SMOOT. No; but I ask the Senator whether there is one there who is capable of filling the position? Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; as superintendent of the negro schools. We have them in that capacity, and we have assistants assigned to negro schools; but the man who directs the whole system, which includes the white as well as the black, is always a white man. He has an assistant usually, or wherever it is practicable, to aid him, devoting his time entirely to the negroes. Whenever practicable we get a capable negro, usually a negro woman, who helps to do that work.

Mr. BRADY. That is your manner of handling it at the present time?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; that is our whole educational system where we put up the entire money and where we give $650,000 out of the fund toward negroes alone, when the negro taxes to that fund are about $150,000.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I understood the Senator from Georgia a moment ago, in answer to a question of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], to say that, under the bill as reported by the committee, the Secretary of Agriculture has the decision with reference to the ultimate disposition of this money?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He has to approve the plan for its

Mr. JONES. But he does not have to approve the college which the legislature may select to use the money?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the legislature would select the college.

Mr. JONES. That is left entirely to the legislature?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; and we do not in my State want the fund if it goes to any but the white college. I will be frank with you. We could not do the work if you should put a negro in charge of white people in conducting demonstrations, but the negroes will be used wherever they can be used, and we will help them, just as we are helping them now. When I tell you that the whole contribution of the negroes to the State's taxes is $173,000, and that the legislature and the governor, all white men, voted $650,000 of the fund to which I have referred to the negro schools, $500,000 being from the contributions of white people, an amount in excess of the total sum which the negroes pay for the entire support of the State, you can not feel that the white people of the State are moved by prejudice. I mention this because I want you to understand that we are carrying the negroes forward and helping them out of our own

Let me say one thing more. Of course we have had a fight in Georgia to try to separate the fund, to use all the white taxes for the white schools and to give nothing to the negro schools except the negro taxes. It is just such fights as this now being made by men who undertake from the outside to interfere that hinder the men in the South who are trying to help the negro.

Mr. SMOOT. For information, I should like to ask the Senator a question or two. Take, for instance, Georgia, where you have an agriculture college for white students and an agriculture college for colored students.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have an agricultural and mechanical college together for the colored.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. What I want to know is this: What has been your experience in Georgia at this agricultural and me-chanical college by way of educating a colored man so that he would be absolutely fitted and qualified in every way to do the demonstration work which we desire to have done under this

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have not had one of whom I know who could do it. The negroes that we use as demonstrators in Georgia are the negroes who have made a special success on their farms, starting as farmers. I do not know one of them who attended the agricultural and mechanical college.

Mr. SMOOT. I am rather surprised at that statement, because I certainly thought that, out of the number of students attending that school, there would certainly be some who would be capable of being educated sufficiently to fit them at least to be demonstrators; but the Senator says that he knows of none

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not recall one; and I do not recall a graduate of Tuskegee who is making a successful farmer That will startle you; but it is so.

Mr. SMOOT. It did startle me when I heretofore heard the Senator make that statement.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have been in every county in my State, and I have discussed agriculture in nearly every county in my State, because I was deeply interested in really putting the college of agriculture on a sound basis. I obtained an appropriation for demonstration work about four years ago, and I have been pressing the demonstration work in Georgia for a number of years. I have noticed that the white people are just as anxious to have the negro improve as a farmer as any human being can be to have a little more income for himself. We bring them where the demonstration goes on; we have demonstrations made on their own land, and we bring them to our agricultural trains.

We find that the best practical means of improving the negro in the country that we have ever tried. If we can get a negro here and there who can take part in the work, and go out and work among the negroes and demonstrate, we use him. There is no race clash in it; they are not in the schoolhouse. We have never engaged in anything in the State which I think has done as much for the negro as the demonstration work of the past four years, when we have been spending about $50,000 a year for this purpose. I think it has done more for him than all we have spent in the rural colored schools.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator stated the amount of taxes that were paid by the colored people. Has he at hand the total amount of taxes paid by the white citizens of the State?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Into that same fund, $3,846,000.

Mr. BRADY. As against how much?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One hundred and seventy-three thousand dollars.

And the amount appropriated for education? Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Six hundred and fifty thousand dollars out of that fund for the negroes exclusively. I mention that solely that I may use it with you to let you see that we are trying out of our own money to help the negro. This is only one fund. This goes almost exclusively into the rural sections; but the special tax in the municipalities and in cities is largely more-I would say several times more-than all the taxes the negroes pay. I think four times as much as they pay as taxes for all purposes is spent on their education alone in the State. We spend several times more on their education in the State than they pay in taxes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish the Senator from Georgia would make complete the statement he has just made, at least complete as I view it, by adding this information: How much does the State of Georgia spend per person for the education of its white people and how much per person for the education of its col-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not give you the exact figures; but more for the white people.

Mr. CUMMINS. How much more?
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I can not give you that exactly. Of course, when we get into the branches of higher education the expense is far greater. The bulk of our work with the negroes is in the lower grades of the common schools.

Mr. CUMMINS. I take it that the State of Georgia probably spends five times as much per person for its white population as for its colored population-probably more than that Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should not be surprised if that were so.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am very sorry that the Senator from Georgia did not make this argument, which is quite persuasive, before my amendment relative to the distribution of this fund that amendment. Just see what the situation is-if the Senator from Georgia will allow me to propound a question at the end of a statement?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly; but I would rather not go back into that discussion until we get through with this.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, I am very anxious to go back. I think that is where we began to go wrong.

The State of Georgia gets a proportion of this appropriation based upon a rural colored population of more than 900,000. In getting that appropriation a colored person has just as much influence as a white man; but having gotten it, according to the Senator's own statements, the policy of the State of Georgia is to spend vastly less per person in the education of its colored race than in the education of its white race.

I am not complaining about the last matter, because the Senator from Georgia and his people understand that situation far better than I do; but I am complaining, and shall continue to complain, that having gotten the appropriation upon the theory that as much will be expended for the black person as for the white person, it is then not so distributed in the educational system of the State.

I think we ought to return to the original proposition, which did not include at all the internal policy of any State with regard to its educational plan, and distribute this money upon some other basis. I am sure the Senator from Georgia, in view of the argument he has made this afternoon, will join me in an effort to reconsider the vote upon that amendment

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am glad to correct the Senator at once. He did not quote me correctly, because he did not quote me entirely. I had distinctly stated that in this farm demonstration work the negro received a benefit and a proportion of the benefit as he did nowhere else. In this farm-demonstration work we go to the negro as much as we do to the white man, and we are teaching him, and he receives his per capita benefit; while in the school house, with the white man far more advanced, and in lines of education far more expensive, with few of the negroes going beyond the fourth grade of the grammer school. The white children stay in school many more years and as many, many more of the white children continue through all the grades of the grammar schools, through high schools, and colleges, the educational work advances in grade the expense greatly increases.

While I believe it is probably true that we spend $5 per capita on our white children to $1 on the negroes in schools and colleges, in the $50,000 that we spend on demonstration work I believe the negro gets his benefit and has his chance just as much as the white man.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Lest the Senator from Iowa and other Senators on that side of the Chamber have an erroneous impression about the facts regarding the distribution of the fund as between the races in the Southern States, I wish to make a statement.

Under the constitution of Mississippi the public schools are required to run not less than four months in the year. The school fund is distributed among the counties according to the number of eligible children. The difference in Mississippi is not so great as the Senator from Georgia has stated it is in Georgia, but the amount is very considerably more.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I admit that I have not any accurate figures. I simply accepted the suggestion. I am not sure it is correct.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The difference is very great in Mississippi, but here is the reason for it: In the black belt the black population ranges from 60 to 94½ per cent of the whole. There are counties in Mississippi-Issaquena, for instance-where the population is about 95 per cent, in round numbers, negroes. The negroes are concentrated upon the great plantations. The schools there are run as long as nine months in the year, and they really can not spend the money; it is not all taken up; while in the hill sections that are settled by white people, as they are in Georgia, and more sparsely settled, there are more schools. It necessarily costs more money to conduct a white school where only a few people live on a section of land than it does to conduct a school in the black belt where 100 or more live on a plantation. That very largely accounts for the disparity.

I want to be entirely candid. The education of the negro does not cost as much as it costs to educate the white man, and the amount of money that is expended in the agricultural and among the States was voted upon, and I have some hope that he may be willing to reconsider his position with regard to of the white than it is in the case of the black. Moreover, the effect of it is more largely felt; the results are very much greater. The reason for the disparity, however, is that the negroes are concentrated; they are more thickly settled in the community than is the case among the white people.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall say but little more upon this subject.

I have sought to let Senators see that the white men of Georgia are not entirely neglectful in the effort to do something for the upbuilding of the negro. I have sought to let Senators see that even if a broader spirit did not influence them, if they were moved only by selfishness, it would be dollars and cents in their pockets to improve these negro farmers. I have sought to show that the negro agricultural and mechanical college is scarcely more than a mechanical school. I am sure that if we had been able to hold more of them on agriculture the State would have contributed more from its treasury toward the school, but while we have tried to check it the preponderance of work there is simply learning a trade.

I have sought to show, and I think I have shown, that the best of all ways to help the negro in our State is through farm demonstration; that there is a great institution there, with the ablest scientists we could gather from all over the Union and from Canada working out scientific truths; that a vast amount of information valuable to the farmer is already there; that under the demonstration which they will conduct every truth they can discover, every truth they have, will be carried to the people of the State and furnished to the farmers of the State, and every effort will be made by them to induce the negroes to use it; and that those who advocate the other course, either through lack of knowledge or from a mistaken sentiment, would seek to divert the fund from its valuable service to one of inefficiency.

I wish the Secretary would read now the letter I sent to the desk. It is a letter telling how the work is done in Mississippi. It will take only a moment, and I shall be glad if Senators will hear it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

FEBRUARY 2, 1914.

Hon. John S. Williams, Washington, D. C.

Dear Senator: I note a running debate in the Senate on the agricultural extension bill. The impression seems to have been left, in the minds of some at least, that the negro in the South will not get any direct benefit from this extension work. Such is not the case. I am in the extension field in Mississippi, paid by State funds, but have opportunity to see and know what men are doing who are in the Federal demonstration service. They are giving this service to colored as well as white people directly, and have both colored demonstrators and many colored cooperators on the farm. The colored farmers are invited to our meetings, and we hold special meetings for them in many sections, and in some cases find that they more readily respond to advanced teaching than some white farmers who have old set ideas to eradicate. We attend their fairs; we visit their industrial schools.

I am giving you this information that you can use if necessary to dispel such an impression if it may so exist in the minds of any of the Senators who may not be properly informed. Personally, I will not be interested in the distribution of this fund, as I am in State work and will likely continue. But we all work along together on the same line as a team working for the common good of all industrial interests, and draw no color line. The measure should remain as it came from the House, as far as the distribution of funds is concerned.

Yours, very truly,

J. F. McKay.

J. F. MCKAY.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, before the question is put I should like to say a word on this matter.

The question is one which I am willing to concede the Senators living in that section of the country understand better than we who do not live there or who are not familiar with the conditions there. At the same time, there is a presentation of the subject which I do not quite understand; and inasmuch as I shall have to vote upon the matter, I think I am entitled to know about it.

As I understand the statement of the Senator who is urging the bill, it is to the interest of the people of the South to make as good farmers as possible of the colored people; it benefits them financially, and in every other way it is to the advantage not only of the colored citizen but of the white man as well; in many cases they are tenant farmers; and yet, at the same time, after the money is in the hands of the white men, who handle it, they spend about one-fifth as much upon the purpose of educating the colored man as they do upon the white ctudent.

It struck me that that was rather an anomalous condition; that if it was for the benefit of the white man to improve the mental condition of the black man, the negro, and by that method, through his tenant farmer, the white man may profit, it might pay him and benefit him to spend a little more money upon him and make him a still better farmer. Yet, according to the contention of the Senator who is urging the bill, that is the very thing he does not wish to do. It may be wise, but to me it does not seem exactly fair; and yet it may be the proper thing to do. I should like to have the Senator say something upon that subject, but I do not know that I shall ask for it.

I stated a while ago that there is an old colored man in some section of the South of whom I have read the statement in a number of papers that he was the most successful farmer, the man who made more off his land than any other individual in that section or in any other portion of the United States; that he had solved the problem of mulching to an extent to which it had not been carried by any other farmer in the country; and that they were taking lessons from him.

In a general way I will say that there is a thing about this bill which has attracted my attention, and that is that there is no farmer in the State from which I come who has written me a letter urging me to assist in the passage of the bill. As a matter of fact, it seems to me the bill is a measure in behalf of teachers, people who are engaged in teaching the farmer, rather than in behalf of the farmer himself. The farmer is to be taxed for his education and to pay somebody for educating him without asking that it shall be done.

I do not question the fact that great good can be done, with the proper system of education, along agricultural lines as well as any other. The farmer, however, does not need that so badly as he needs many other things. If the farmer is allowed a free market and given an opportunity to make a profit from his produce, he will till his land to the full extent that it will stand tilling, and there is where he needs help at this time. He does not need to be taxed to have some person come around and teach him how to carry on his farming in order that he may produce more, when he does not receive the full benefit from that which he now raises. In addition to that, it will not benefit the farmer to teach him how to live upon less, how to eat less, how to make it go further, or how to raise more upon his land, if he is not allowed to benefit from it; if the benefit is to go to some owner, some landlord, or to some trust or combination which handles his product before it reaches the market. He does not need some scientific person to come around and teach his wife how to stretch the beefsteak for supper in order to make it meet the demands of the family so much as he needs free access to the markets of the country and a fair price for his product after he raises it.

It rather struck me that the bill was designed for the benefit and advancement of the teacher more than for the benefit and advancement of the man who tills the soil. I have not heard any very strenuous petitions on the part of the farmer in behalf of the bill.

In regard to the amendment I will say that, as a matter of fairness, it appeals to me. I have great respect for the experience of the Senators from the South, but if the negro is to receive but one-fifth of the money, and the benefit is to go to the landlord, I do not see just where the negro is going to profit very much from it. That does not appeal to me as a fair propo-

I think I shall vote in favor of the amendment on those grounds. While by chemical analysis the bill might be proved to be fair, as a matter of fact, on its face it does not seem so

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 6, 1914, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 5, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, draw us, we pray Thee, by Thy holy influence very close to Thee, that Thy thoughts may be our thoughts, Thy justice our justice, Thy ways our ways, Thy will our will; that the issues of this day may be the fruits of love and good will to our fellow men, for when our attitude is right toward our fellow men we may be sure that we are in harmony with Thee. So may Thy kingdom come and Thy will be done in us, now and always. In His name. Amen.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 48 in lieu of House bill 1739, on the same subject,

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Hous-TON] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 48 in lieu of House bill 1739, heretofore pending. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Har-RISON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 48, with Mr. Harrison in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 48 in lieu of House bill 1739, and the Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

S. 48. An act to authorize the President of the United States to cate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, the pending bill is to authorize the construction of not exceeding 1,000 miles of railroad in the Territory of Alaska by the United States Government, between such points and over such routes and in such manner as may be determined by the President of the United States. For this purpose the United States is authorized to borrow, upon the issue of its own bonds, for the purpose of construc-tion, $35,000,000. This money is to be repaid to the Treasury of the United States from the sale of public lands in Alaska, the value of which is supposed to be materially increased by the construction of the road.

The measure has received the earnest indorsement of the citizens of Alaska and is urged by the Delegate in Congress from that Territory. It was framed in accordance with the recommendations of the Alaskan Railway Commission, a body created by the last Congress for the express purpose of investigating and determining whether the Government of the United States should engage in the construction of railroads in the Territory, and if so, to what extent. It has been recommended to Congress by the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, in his annual report filed December 19, 1913. It has been mentioned with special approval and recommended to the immediate attention of the legislative branch of the Government by President Wilson in his annual message at the opening of the present Congress. The bill is reported to the House with, I believe, but two dissenting votes. This consensus of opinion indicates that Congress. the matter has had thoughtful and careful consideration and that some vital necessity exists for the legislation.

In the minds of most people Alaska calls up only visions of snow fields and the weird light of the midnight sun. It is regarded as a land of perpetual snow, barren, rugged, inhabited only by fur-clad Eskimos, polar bears, and seals. It has been found, however, by actual exploration and scientific investigation carried on under the auspices of the Government to be a storehouse of vast treasures. It is so far from worthless that it actually possesses agricultural possibilities, both of soil and climate, exceeding those of Norway, Sweden, and Finland. capable of producing food for man and beast by agricultural cultivation sufficient to support a rugged and hardy population of the white race with the force and vigor of development which distinguishes the countries on the Baltic Sea. I have no knowledge, outside of what has been laid before this House, of the resources of Alaska agriculturally, and yet it is a matter of considerable interest that there is a very large element of agricultural development in certain valleys in Alaska.

Alaska is so enormous in its extent that it is easily possible for certain sections of the Territory to be valuable for agricultural purposes, while other sections of the Territory are utterly out of the range of agricultural possibilities. But if it be true, as it seems to be, on the showing made here, that there are in the Territory of Alaska some agricultural possibilities sufficient to sustain or aid in sustaining a white population in that Territory, that adds very materially to the promise of success of the proposed development of Alaska.

Alaska cost the United States $7,200,000 at the time of its purchase from Russia in 1867. Up to that time little attempt had been made to develop any of the resources of Alaska except the seal fisheries, the whale fisheries, and some rather inferior lines of bartering with the Indians. For many years after our purchase of the Territory it was regarded as practically worthless and its only prominence in national or international affairs was by reason of the fact that it contained the breeding grounds of the most valuable fur seals. It became necessary to protect these grounds by international agreement and the regulations were enforced by the Revenue-Cutter Service of the United States. It was only in the closing years of the nineteenth century that the discovery of gold in the streams and beach sands of Alaska led to the rush of white adventurers. These adventurers in their eager search for wealth poured over all portions of the Territory, thus carrying on the work of exploration. They found placer gold mines in paying quantities and in widely scattered regions and sent to the United States more than $200,000,000 in gold. It was this wonderful discovery of gold in Alaska at that opportune time which made possible the success of a gold standard of currency in this country and freed us from a financial servitude to the Bank of England. The gold of Alaska poured into the lap of our Nation more rapidly than the gold of the Rand poured into that of Great Britain, and, unlike our British cousins, we were put to no war of conquest to perfect our title to the treasure. The discovery of gold-placer mining indicated in Alaska, as it did in California, the presence of quartz mining. The gold which is found in river sands and in the sands of the seashore is worn off by attrition from the quartz ledges far in the interior and carried down by streams to its place of deposit. As the placer mining gradually gives out discovery is made of the sources of supply in the quartz ledges. At the present time quartz mining is carried on very extensively and the output is almost as great as during the most active period of placer mining.

The work of the army of prospectors and adventurers who invaded the Territory during the gold rush has been supplemented by the scientific exploration and investigation of the Geological Survey of the United States. As a result not only gold-quartz mining has been established as a paying industry, but there have been discovered vast deposits of coal, copper, and oil. Some of the coal is of the very highest quality, both anthracite and bituminous. Much of it is of a low grade of lignite character, suitable for local consumption for fuel in that cold climate. The deposits of copper are exceedingly valuable and run to a very high percentage pure copper, while the wealth of oil has never been estimated.

The annual production of wealth in Alaska at the present time is astonishing to those who have made no detailed study of the situation. In 1912 the production of gold was $16,500,000; of copper, $4,904,715; gypsum, marble, and tin, $297,365; fisheries, $17,373,566; making a total of $39,075,646. Alaska produces more canned salmon annually than Oregon and Washington combined. From 1867, the year we purchased Alaska, down to and including the year 1911, Alaska had produced in natural wealth near $430,000,000, which was brought into the general volume of trade in the United States. The Territory cost us originally $7,200,000, and the Federal Government has expended on the Territory for all purposes, including the post office and the expenses of the Revenue-Cutter Service for the protection of the seals, a total of $28,616,674.25. The total cash receipts from the Internal Revenue and Postal Service in that time has been $17,117,354.79. The Federal Government therefore has paid out in governing the Territory and for the original purchase price $18,609,319.46 more than it has received. As a result, however, of this expenditure the people of the United States have profited in national wealth more than $400,000,000. It may be said that there is no other new territory acquired by the United States which has shown within the first years of its administration such a substantial return upon the investment and cost of maintenance.

As President Wilson said in his annual message to Congress, Alaska is a vast storehouse of treasure belonging to the Nation at large. We must unlock it for the benefit of all of the people of the Nation. We are confronted now with the supreme test of the entire theory of national conservation. We must choose between two possible courses: Either this national wealth must be opened up and developed for the benefit of the people of the United States, or it must be turned over entirely to the Alaska Syndicate, comprising the Morgan-Guggenheim interests, to be developed as an asset of private monopoly. I need not pause at this time to catalogue the economic and political crimes enacted by the Morgan-Guggenheim Syndicate in Alaska since the wonderful rediscovery of that Territory during the gold excitement of 1898. The story running in the sober records of the courts includes everything from the corruption and bribery of judges to the wanton attack by armed bands of assassins upon the workmen engaged in rival enterprises. It is a drama of greed and carnage unparalleled since the days of Warren Hastings. Its scenes were enacted not only upon the snow-clad plains of the Arctic Circle but in the banks of Wall Street and the counting rooms of London. It is this high-handed and lawless attempt to grab the tremendous resources of Alaska which caused the locking up of that great Territory by legislative enactment. The story of Alaska as portrayed in the newspapers, the magazines, and the current novels has crystallized the public opinion of America in favor of conservation as against unlimited exploitation by syndicates and monopolies,

Let us take a brief glance at the history of Alaska during the last few years in her relation to the Nation. The effect of the discovery of gold was to attract a large number of adventurers from all parts of the United States to the Territory of Alaska. The foundation of the wealth of the Territory was the gold placer mining, which was within the reach of any prospector who had the courage and tenacity of purpose to achieve success. Deposits of gold were found in widely scattered parts of the Territory, and the restless prospectors, in their search for gold, discovered but left undeveloped many other sources of natural wealth.

Immediately following the gold rush the United States Government, through the Geological Survey, began a scientific investigation of the resources of Alaska, with the surprising result of the discovery of vast deposits of coal, copper, tin, and other workable minerals. The Federal Government also, through the agricultural experiment station, discovered possibilities of producing in some of the fertile valleys of Alaska during its short summer a supply of certain hardy foods for Through the schools established for the Eskiman and beast. mos and Indians a successful attempt was made to acclimate and breed domestic rindeer of northern Europe. entific efforts of the Government toward developing to the fullest extent the natural resources of Alaska were intended to make that great land available for all of the people of the At once, however, the slimy tentacles of the steal around those resources. All of the domi-United States. trust began to steal around those resources. nant financial interests in Alaska, including the banking house of J. P. Morgan & Co., which was financing various industries, the great copper trust of the Guggenheims, which was interested in seizing the copper resources of the Territory, and certain British and Canadian banks, which had seized all the available passes through the mountains for railroads into the British territory of the Yukon, combined and consolidated themselves under the name of the Alaska Syndicate. The boldness and lawlessness of this syndicate startled the entire country. In 1904 Congress attempted to throw open the coal lands to private purchasers under the same law which had applied to coal deposits in the public lands of Wyoming and other Western States. That law fixed the price at $10 per acre, with certain easy terms in proving up the claim. It was assumed that it would work to the advantage of the small proprietor and permit the coal lands to be developed by individual owners. Exactly the contrary proved to be the case. Immediately large bunches of filings were made, which may have been in technical compliance with the law, but were in fraud upon the rights of the Government by the Alaska Syndicate or those under its control. So rapidly was this work carried on that in two years—to wit, in 1906—President Roosevelt, by a sweeping order, withdrew from entry all of the coal lands in Alaska.

It is claimed that this act of Roosevelt's was unauthorized by law, and that is probably true in a literal and technical sense; but the American people neither by direct action at the polls nor through their chosen Representatives in Congress have ever reversed that order. On the contrary, the greatest scandal of President Taft's administration was the alleged attempt of Secretary Ballinger to issue patents in the Cunningham coal These claims, if not actually fraudulent, were so clearly in violation of the public interest that they had been the original cause of the withdrawal of the coal lands from entry and the subsequent block up of the Territory for all forms of development.

In 1910 Congress expressly ratified the withdrawal of the coal lands and provided for their segregation and appraisement. From the time of this withdrawal down to the present time the resources of Alaska, which are based upon the accessibility of coal, have been locked up from all forms of development. Even under this adverse condition of affairs, the great natural wealth of the Territory and the energy of its citizens have contributed nearly $40,000,000 annually to the national wealth. To-day the situation confronts Congress of either reversing the policy of conservation and turning Alaska back again into the hands of the Alaska Syndicate to be exploited solely in the interest of private greed and partly for the benefit of British and Canadian bankers, or else finding some means of making those resources available for the people of the Territory and for the people of the United States. It is either the Government or the Guggenheims. This proposed railway is the key to the situation, for under existing circumstances no railroad can be financed or built in Alaska by private enterprise except by the Alaska Syn-dicate. The roads projected by the Alaska Syndicate would be so constructed as to give them control of the coal fields, the copper deposits, the passes through the mountains, and the available harbors, without any regard primarily to the general or uniform development of the Territory. Under these circumstances I am strongly in favor of giving to the President of the United States the power, as contemplated by this bill, to construct such railroads as will open up the entire Territory, the cost of which railroads will be reimbursed out of the increased value and increased sale of public lands in Alaska.

The opponents of this bill are divided between those who favor the removal of all restrictions from private enterprise, and who insist that the Territory will be developed by private initiative if the restraints of the conservation act are removed, and those who favor some form of Government aid to a railroad short of the actual construction by the Government. Those who favor the development solely by private enterprise draw a very beautiful picture of a sturdy pioneer going into a new country with his ox team and his household furniture and establishing a humble but independnet American home. Those who favor the Government extending its aid to the construction of a railroad without actual Government ownership admit that under existing conditions proper railroad facilities can not be obtained in Alaska through any source except the Alaska Syndicate unless by the use of the Government credit. They advocate that some private corporation be aided, either by land grants or by the issue of Government bonds or by the Government indorsement and guaranty of its own bonds, to build such railroad. Both sets of opponents are wrong and their arguments not only fail to meet the needs of this situation but are contrary to the teachings of history. If Alaska were a land of generous agricultural resources like the Mississippi Valley, where the life of man and the domestic animals could be supported even in the unbroken wilderness, the sturdy pioneer might find his way in with an oxcart, and might take his family with him and establish an independent American home, but as applied to actual conditions in Alaska, where the wealth is more largely mineral than agricultural, and where transportation is the only possible basis of development, the picture of the sturdy pioneer with his oxcart is a wild dream of the imagination. In fact, the sturdy pioneer did not get very far west of the Mississippi River without the aid of Government subsidized railroads.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. GOULDEN. Does not the gentleman think that when they spoke about ox teams they really meant reindeers?

Mr. BORLAND. Well, they might have meant that the sturdy pioneer could use reindeers, but the sturdy pioneer in Alaska is not going to develop the country by either ox team or reindeers, if I know anything about pioneering, and I think I do, as I am the son of a pioneer myself.

Those who contend that the Government should aid by land grants, money, or credit some private corporation to build a railroad are refuted also by the facts of history. Nearly all of the railroads west of the Mississippi River were built with Government aid or with the aid of States, counties, and town-Some of them managed to secure all forms of aid, and the aid thus given by the people through the taxing power of the various divisions of government exceeded in a large measure the cost of construction of the roads. It is only necessary to direct our attention to the great transcontinental roads which were directly aided by the Federal Government. In 1862 the first act was passed offering a land grant to the Union Pacific Railroad. This was followed in quick succession by grants to the Central Pacific, the Southern Pacific, the Northern Pacific, the Central Branch, and the Kansas Division. Between 1862 and 1875 the United States Government contributed to these roads 155,000,000 acres of land, worth approximately $400,-000,000, and $65,000,000 of Government bonds. It has been said that the railroads could not and would not have been built but for the aid of the Government in a new territory where the local business would not support the road.

Assuming this to be true, the plan adopted proved to be wasteful, extravagant, and unsatisfactory to the people of the United States and to the Government. The amount contributed by the Federal Government directly would have built the roads twice over. It encouraged a wild era of speculation and debauchery of finance which plunged the West and the entire country into a disastrous panic in 1873. The failure of the banking house of Jay Cooke & Co., which precipitated this panic was the direct result of the frenzied finance of the Union Pacific Railroad. The plan resulted in political corruption, extortion of the set-tlers, and fraud upon the Government, in the increase of the expenses of the Land Department, in litigations and evictions of homesteaders, and bitterness between the citizens and the corporations, which finally culminated in the granger legislation which swept the entire West about 1880. In less than 10 years after the first grant of land was made the effects of the political blunder were clearly apparent and the Government abandoned for all time the plan of subsidizing railroads by land grants. The favorite argument on behalf of land grants was that they would facilitate the settlement of homesteads along the line of the railroad, but even this argument fails entirely in the case of Alaska, where the lands which the corporation would take are chiefly valuable for their mineral deposits. Lewis H. Haney, professor of political economy at the University of Michigan, has recently written a very valuable monograph on the "Congressional history of railways in the United States, 1850 to 1887." In discussing at length the history and operations of the land-grant railroads Prof. Haney makes this conservative statement:

Without statement:

Without standing for Government ownership as a general policy, the question may be raised whether in this case our Government might not have built the first Pacific railway with relative profit. As opposed to the policy of assistance which was adopted and administered it would seem simpler. Here private interests ran amuck and the tardy light of publicity only guided the historian. Economic waste and political corruption were rife, while constant litigation injured both railway credit and national dignity. In the light of history it may reasonably be maintained that the United States would have best solved the Pacific railway problem that confronted it in 1860 by constructing a national railway over the central route, leaving to private initiative, aided only by adequate rights of way and materials, the exploitation of secondary railway lines.

It may also be said in this connection that whether Government ownership of railroads will ever become an established policy of our Government is still a debatable question in the minds of many people. If there is any section of our land where Government ownership could be tried as an initial ex-periment with a fair promise of success and with little disturbance of our economic system, it is in Alaska. Alaska is a Territory of the United States, and the Federal Government has plenary power over it. No constitutional restrictions such as might exist in the case of a State apply to Alaska. The constitutional power of the Government to construct railroads there is full and complete. Its situation is so isolated and its economic conditions so different from those of the rest of the country that it seems that the experiment might safely be If it did not prove a success in Alaska there would be less reason to try the dangerous and expensive experiment throughout the United States generally of Government ownership of railroads.

The cost of the proposed railroad in Alaska will be reimbursed from the sale of public lands in that Territory. These lands vary greatly in value. Some are totally worthless and some are of enormous value on account of their mineral de-The best scientific information obtainable shows that their value, properly used, will more than pay for the cost of construction of the proposed railroad, without ultimate expense to the people of the United States. Under these circumstances it would be equally bad business and bad political policy to grant these lands to a private corporation of uncertain credit as a reward for constructing a railroad when the work can probably be done at less cost, and certainly on a firmer basis of credit, by the Federal Government. The United States can borrow money at 3 per cent, but no private railroad corporation in Alaska can borrow it at less than 6 per cent, and the expense of commissions and discounts would probably make the rate of interest at least 8 or 10 per cent.

But on even broader grounds I am in favor of this bill. am in favor of developing the resources of this vast Territory primarily for the benefit of the people who live there and for the benefit of the people of the United States, rather than for the benefit of a nonresident, partly foreign corporation. I am in favor of maintaining the spirit and principle of conservation. The best conservation is the wise use of the natural resources, so protected by law as to prevent the encroachment of private monopoly. To my mind, Government aid or the lending of Government credit to some pet corporation would be just as disastrous in the end as a return to the control of the Alaska Syndicate. Thus far conservation has meant to the Alaskan only the withdrawing of all primary resources from private ownership and private development. The aim and object of conservation is not to lock up resources, but to permit their general use. The Alaskans have borne this condition of local restraint for eight years and some reasonable answer to their demand for relief must be made. They feel that they can develop that great Territory with energy, courage, and success. They feel that they are entitled to use as an asset for that purpose the basis of credit of their public lands. In this demand they are fully in line with the advanced thought of our country on the subject of conservation. They have the hearty support of President Wilson and Secretary Lane, both of whom are conscientious, clear-headed, and conservative public officials. Under this policy I believe that the Territory of Alaska will become a great storehouse of treasure, filled with a vigorous white population, which will add to the national wealth, peace, prosperity, and happiness of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. ANSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of my colleague,

Mr. Goeke, who is unavoidably absent, I ask unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOEKE. Mr. Chairman, the key to unlock the great storehouse of Alaska is a railroad built, owned, and operated by the people. Railroads were the keys which opened the locks of our undeveloped West, and made it possible for the people to move in and develop the lands. Alaska is a part of our great Nation, and her citizens are the same as we of the States, and they should have the protection, the care, and the laws we have. No discrimination against the Territory or her people or added hardship in development of the resources of that country should for a moment be allowed. Her people are asking only for what our western citizens now enjoy, and have enjoyed in the past—to help in the upbuilding of their land. Many people from my State, as well as from every State within our borders, have been there, and a great number wish to return. It is but fair that we give the Territory the helping and needful hand so that the farming lands in the interior, the mineral resources, and the business of the country can meet with development that follows railroad construction, as has followed railroad construction throughout our great West.

I am not going into detail to show the valuable holdings of the country. All of the Members here are convinced, more or less, of the wealth of the land, but there are a few would like to call your attention to. How was it that the United States became the owner of this country? Lest we forget. I will go back to the time when the United States, stricken down with war, crippled, weak, and our bonds worth 50 cents on the dollar, and no one knew what the morrow would bring forth, threatened by a great power in Europe-now our cousins across the way-just at that time another great power, Russia, made it quite plain to our cousins that war on us meant war between those two great European nations. That is why England was stopped from jumping upon the helpless, tottering States

If England had then been permitted by Russia to fight us, there would probably have been different history about us now. In gratitude for this brotherly act the Government at Washington wished to make a substantial return for the expenses that Russia had been obliged to assume in order to make preparation for the defense she undertook in our behalf. Russia then owned both Siberia and Alaska and looked upon both countries as a great glacial, moss-covered arctic region. Russian and Washington diplomats finally agreed upon the Alaskan purchase plan, Russia only too glad to let go of her iceberg across the Bering Straits. President Johnson expressed his reason of the purchase in his annual message in true diplomatic language, for at that time the matter was considered a very close State secret. I repeat that we owe a moral obligation to the country that was at that time our greatest friend. We also owe something to the descendants of the people Russia turned over to our care and keeping, as well as to our brothers and sisters of our States who have cast their future in that Territory.

For a moment let us see what Russia has done for the other glacial country-Siberia-similar in all respects, climatic, agricultural, mineral, timberlands, and so forth. Since the discovery was made in Siberia that her lands would produce in bountiful harvests Russia has built a great system of railroads across the country. Side branch lines, connecting at both ends with the main line, have been put in operation. Over 2,000,000 people have emigrated from southern and western Russia into the lands of Siberia. The shipping has so increased that the Government has opened up arctic ports and built railroads to connect with the arctic port of Archangel. Extensive warehouses at this port are used to store grain and other freight, and in the summer, when shipping is possible in the Arctic Ocean, steamships go to the port and load with the accumulated freight for European markets. With over 10,000 miles of main line and branches in Siberia, that Government has found that a second system of railroads across the country is now necessary. For two years that Government has been constructing this second system of railroads, which, when completed, will be 7,000 miles

The first system of railroads is paying operating expenses and fixed charges and bringing in a large profit each year, and that Government is using the money so derived in track improvement and new lines, as well as the upbuilding of country roads and stage lines. Nearly every part of Siberia can be reached to-day by the Government owned and operated railroads or by a stagecoach operated by the Government. If we take as an example what is being done in Siberia as to what we may expect from Alaska, then there should be no fear as to the road paying or that the weather is too cold to operate the line.

There are Members here who represent districts that produce coal, timber, oils, and minerals. Alaska's development, it has been suggested, may close some of the markets now obtainable upon the Pacific coast, both with regard to sales to the Government, the public, and to foreign commerce. The great State of Ohio, and in particular the district which I have the honor to represent, may feel for a short time the marketing of the abundant resources known to exist in Alaska, but we feel that trade will adjust itself, and if we do not send to the coast one thing the upbuilding of the Territory will increase the demand for other manufactured goods, machinery, and so forth, so that in no event will we lose. And this is quite true with every other State, and why be afraid? Are you trying to keep Alaska back and her development locked up for fear that our own States may suffer? How about the 350,000 American farmers who have gone into a similar country in Canada, of whom a large majority became citizens in order to take up lands? If rail-road transportation had been built across the Tanana Valley, how many of the 350,000 Americans now Canadians would have gone to the Tanana and remained at least under our flag? We all want to keep our farming class at least under the flag. The Government of Canada has given cash and bonds as guaranties and her lands to secure railroad construction across lands similar in all respects to Alaskan lands and climate. Did the people go, and have the railroads paid in this so-called frozen North? The American farmers, with their families and their friends, number over a million persons in Canada. The railroads are meeting with success. More lines are under construction. We have the example of Government ownership and operation in Siberia, Russia, and Germany, all very successfully operated railroads. In Canada we have the example of the Government unconditional guaranties, both principal and interest, and the railroads are a success.

Laws are about to be enacted by this Congress governing the issuing of railroad securities, limiting and restricting the amount of the issue to the actual investment made. This will eliminate the speculative features of railroad construction. There will be no further opportunity for so-called "melon cutting," jobbing," and "syndicate frauds," and hence the speculative railroad magnate who has been dealing in American railroads will not venture into Alaska, deprived of the opportunity of making exorbitant profits out of railroad construction. can be no question but what the people of this country want a law of that character, and it is certain that one will be enacted. With this condition of affairs it is a foregone conclusion that no bank or banker, European or American, will undertake the financing of an Alaskan railroad unless our Government gives its unconditional guaranty of the securities. Government aid the attempt to finance a railroad in Alaska would be a waste of time and energy. As the Government owns almost all the Territory, it would hesitate a long time before giving such unconditional guaranty and add thereto a part of the lands to any private corporation or railroad promoter as an inducement for railroad construction; and hence it follows that the Government must undertake the construction of a railroad itself if it would do its duty by Alaska and develop this great Territory

The distinguished and able Secretary of the Department of the Interior, Hon. Franklin K. Lane, 'n a letter dated May 15, 1913, addressed to the Hon. Key Pittman, chairman of the Committee on Territories of the United States Senate, in reference to the policy of the construction and ownership by the National Government of a railway system in the Territory of Alaska, says:

Alaska, says:

I favor the adoption of this policy. I believe it to be that under which Alaska will develop most safely and most speedily and under which the resources of that Territory will most certainly become available to the whole people.

There is but one way to make any country a real part of the world—by the construction of railroads into it. This has been the heart of England's policy in Africa, of Russia's policy in western Asia, and is the prompting hope of the new movement in China. Whoever owns the railways of a country determines very largely the future of that country, the character of its population, the kind of industries they will engage in, and ultimately the nature of the civilization they will enjoy. The policy of governmental ownership of railroads in Alaska seems to me to be the one that will most certainly make for her lasting welfare.

To many of our people Alaska is little more than a land of natural wonders, here and there dotted with mining camps and fishing villages. If Alaska is to be nothing more, it is almost a matter of indifference as to who builds her railroads. I have talked with many who know that country well, and I am convinced that we should think of Alaska as a land not only of mines and fisheries but of towns, farms, mills, and factories, supporting millions of people of the hardiest and most wholesome of the race. If this conception of a possible Alaska is a true one, our legislation should be such as to most surely bring out this possibility, and it seems to me there is less of hazard as to Alaska's future if the Government of the United States owns the railroads which will make its fertile interior valleys accessible from the coast and bring its coal, iron, copper, and other mineral resources within the reach of the world.

This is a new policy for the United States. Very true. This is a new part of the United States, And policies properly change with new conditions. The one determining question in all matters of government should be: What is the wise thing to do? The ancient method of opening a country was to build wagon roads. The modern method is to build railroads. To build these railroads ourselves and control them may be an experiment, but such a plan does not suggest scandals more shameful or political conditions more unhealthy than many we have known in new portions of our country under private ownership. And in the end we will be free to establish and maintain our own chosen relationship between Alaska and the rest of the United States, unhampered by threats of confiscation or the restraining hand of any merely selfish influences. We can only secure the highest and fullest use of Alaska by making her railways wholly subordinate to her industrial and social life and needs—true public utilities.

This statement, coming from one so fully informed on this question, ought to dispel all doubts as to the correctness of the policy advocated in the bill under consideration. But if, notwithstanding all that can and has been urged in favor of the Government constructing and owning a railroad system in Alaska, there still remains doubt in the mind of any Member on this side of the Chamber as to his duty in the premises, he might follow with absolute safety the great leader of the Democratic Party, the President of the United States, who, in his annual message to the Congress on this subject, clearly indicates in his usual convincing style what he regards ought to be done. I quote from his message:

done. I quote from his message:

A duty faces us with regard to Ahaska which seems to me very pressing and very imperative; perhaps I should say a double duty, for it concerns both the political and the material development of the Territory. The people of Alaska should be given the full Territorial form of government, and Alaska, as a storehouse, should be unlocked. One key to it is a system of railways. These the Government should itself build and administer, and the ports and terminals it should itself control in the interest of all who wish to use them for the service and development of the country and its people.

But the construction of railways is only the first step, is only thrusting in the key to the storehouse and throwing back the lock and opening the door. How the tempting resources of the country are to be exploited is another matter, to which I shall take the liberty of from to time calling your attention, for it is a policy which must be worked out by well-considered stages, not upon theory but upon lines of practical expediency. It is part of our general problem of conservation. We have a freer hand in working out the problem in Alaska than in the United States of the Union; and yet the principle and object are the same, wherever we touch it. We must use the resources of the country, not lock them up There need be no conflict or fealousy as between State and Federal authorities, for there can be no essential difference of purpose between them. The resources in question must be used, but not monopolized upon any narrow idea of individual rights as against the abiding interests of communities. That a policy can be worked out by conference and concession which will release these resources and yet not feopard or dissipate them I for one have no doubt; and it can be done on lines of regulation, which need be no less acceptable to the people and Government of the Nation at large, whose heritage these resources are. We must bend our counsels to this end. A common purpose ought to make agreement easy.

I believe that the policy of President Wilson, just stated, is the correct and true policy for the Government to follow with respect to Alaska, and I shall therefore with great pleasure vote for the bill under consideration.

The building of a railroad in Alaska in no sense commits this Government to the policy of obtaining the ownership and operation of the railroads in the United States. That question is not involved in the measure under consideration. Neither is the country ready at this time to even seriously consider that great problem. I am confident that no party will under-take to acquire the railroads of the country and operate the same without first having that issue distinctly and definitely determined by the people of the country at a general election by proper platform declarations.

The fact is that the Government requires coal, oil, timber, and also the opening up of the Territory to settlement. The railroad is the one necessity that will accomplish the result. Alaska with the railroad will soon have a large population, and will make for us a very strong and comfortable possession, adding to our own naval and military strength, of great value to us. Alaska will serve as an insurance against war on the Pacific. Our aggressive Pacific Ocean neighbors will hesitate a long time before they make the attempt when Alaska is opened up and is peopled by that splendid citizen, the American farmer. Alaska is big enough to become a great nation herself and is rich enough to hold her own.

There is a most important matter I wish to call to your attention. We all feel proud of our Military Academy. West Point is known to you all. With pride we look upon the splendid system of work it has accomplished, and upon the perfect men it has turned out. It has been said that if a man had it in him, that the Military Academy would devolp the best parts of his make-up. We have a most excellent example in Col. George W. Goethals, the builder of the Panama Canal. It is the system of West Point brought out through this genius that has built the canal. This same system has been ably demonstrated by the Army in Alaska. The Army has been building trails, roads, attending to the care of the wounded and sick, and maintaining order in the country for 17 years. early days of the rush of gold seekers to Alaska-1807-98and prior to the establishment of civil law, the Army was the means of saving thousands. Hospitals were built and care was given to the suffering. People went to that country totally unprepared, and but for the efforts of the Army there would have been many deaths to record. The men of the Army, enthused by their leader to accomplish results, have dragged hundred. dreds of tons of telegraph wire across the valleys and mountains and constructed a good telegraph system. They have accomplished a great deal with a small force. These men have worked for small pay, and close to others who were comfortably housed and receiving ten times the salary for lighter em-It was the system, the Military Academy leader who accomplished the result. The Panama Canal was about to be let out to contract construction when it was finally decided to have the Army do the work. The people of the United States now see the wisdom of that decision. I believe that the great majority of the people of the United States would like to see the Army put in charge of the railroad construction in Alaska. We have every faith in our President, and know that he will do the right thing at the right time, and I for one would not limit his powers, but to satisfy all of the people in this matter, and to further show our high appreciation of the men from West Point, and to encourage our young men now in the academy, to demonstrate our high appreciation of the men of the Army, I propose at the proper time to offer an amendment to the bill H. R. 1739 to the effect that the actual construction work of the Government railroads in Alaska will be under the direct charge of the Army.

I hope that this side of the Chamber will stand by the President and aid in the passage of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. Chairman, the measure now under consideration for the construction of a railroad in Alaska proposes that the Government shall issue bonds bearing 3 per cent interest, and with the proceeds of the bond sale carry on the work. These bonds are to be secured, so to say, by a first mortgage upon all of the property owned by the United States in the Territory of Alaska and elsewhere. The amount of bonds to be issued, as proposed in this bill, is $35,000,000; however, the bill as passed by the Senate carried $40,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, we are at peace with the world. Our annual revenues are enormous. The interest on these bonds, amounting to more than a million dollars a year, must be paid by taxing the people. This interest payment will go on and on, like Tennyson's Brook, for we never pay Government bonds. Why pledge our property in Alaska and our resources at home? Why mortgage our future to build this railroad in the frozen gorges of this far-away land?

We are told, Mr. Chairman, that there is great demand for this bill, that we must open up Alaska and give the dwellers in the crowded cities a chance to "go out west" and grow up with the country. Now, sir, I am perfectly willing to open up Alaska and permit anyone to go there who cares to do so, but I am not willing that the Government should finance this polar expedition at the instance of interested cupidity on the one hand and credulous ignorance on the other.

Why build this railroad? I shall not at this time discuss the general question of Government ownership. I have small patience with the dreams of socialism. But grant, for the moment, that the Socialists are right and that the Government should own everything from railroads to soda fountains, why should we go railroad building in the neighborhood of the North Pole, while so many transportation additions are required in the United States, where people can live and do live?

When conditions in Alaska are generally understood the people in the United States will no longer marvel that the population of that Territory has only increased 733 souls in the past We have owned this colossal chunk of frozen earth 10 years. for more than 50 years, and with great labor and expense we have succeeded in thawing out only two or three thousand acres sufficiently for the growth of quickly maturing crops.

Mr. Chairman, Alaska is a mining proposition pure and simple. We have gold and copper and coal in Alaska. already been built and is now in operation a railroad to the principal copper mines. I believe it is not contended that railroads are necessary to bring away the gold we find there. True, we catch a great quantity of fish in Alaska, but they are taken from navigable waters, and I have never heard it contended that railway transportation was required for the handling of this product. We also receive from Alaska a goodly quantity of furs, but they are likewise secured in navigable waters and do not require additional means of transportation. But the coal mines of Alaska, say the advocates of this bill, can not be developed without additional railroads. And I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that that is true. Of course it has never been contended that Alaska coal could be shipped into many parts of the United States.

The long haul and consequent high freight rates would pre-clude that. But when this bill was first brought forward it was said by its sponsors that we needed Alaskan coal to use in the Navy on the Pacific coast. That argument, I must confess, never appealed to me very strongly, but even that poor excuse has been utterly shattered. Now comes the Secretary of the Navy and informs us that his department has completely abandoned the use of coal so far as future construction is concerned, and that many of the vessels already built are being fitted with oil burners, and that oil is to be the future fuel of the Navy. Nay, more, the Secretary informs us that the Government is now conducting negotiations with a view to Government ownership of oil wells, pipe lines, and refineries.

Mr. Chairman, we appropriated $75,000 at a former session for the purpose of testing the coal produced at the Bering mines in Alaska. The Bering coal was said to be the best to be found in Alaska. We have since appropriated double that amount for the purpose of testing the product of the Matanuska field. The test for the Bering coal has already been made, and the Secretary of the Navy reports that this coal is utterly unfit for use in the Navy. The other Alaskan coal has not yet been tested, but we have nothing upon which to base the hope or belief that it will prove superior to that already tried and These tests were made by Government agents, friendly to Alaska and to this bill. In the first place, the coal was taken from the mine by employees of the Government. Five hundred tons were secured for the purpose. A large part of this coal was used, or attempted to be used, on the U.S. S. Maryland, and, as I have stated, proved worthless as a coal Those who were clamoring for the Alaska for use in the Navy. appropriation were dissatisfied with the test which I have de-They contended that the coal used was negligently mined and contained a large quantity of dirt and gravel. They demanded a further test under more favorable circumstances. The entire matter was in the hands of the friends of this measure, and a further test was made with this coal at the Government testing grounds at Annapolis. Fifty tons were used in this last test. In order to try the coal under the most favorable conditions it was washed and screened. The test was then made and the Acting Secretary of the Navy reported "with regret" that this coal was "unsuitable for naval use."

I do not contend for a moment, Mr. Chairman, that Alaskan coal can not be used in Alaska successfully for many local purposes. I know from all the reports that it can. But I also know with equal assurance that it is neither possible nor necessary to bring this coal to the United States, with the possible exception of the northwestern frontier.

The Government has in its employ a great number of persons whose business it is to examine into the mineral resources of the country. The geologists have examined very carefully and repeatedly our coal supply, present and future. They report that we have enough in sight here in the United States to last us and our successors in existence something over 7,000 years. That, of course, does not include the vast coal deposits in Alaska, where, if the report of the Weather Bureau is to be credited, a goodly quantity will be required for home consumption, in the event the farmers of New York City ever decide to go homesteading in that direction.

But, Mr. Chairman, it was not ordained in nature that man should live on coal alone. The miner of coal will need meat and bread. But the farmers of Alaska, say you, will supply these articles. What will the farmer take his pay in—coal? We have owned Alaska for more than half a century. In that time there has been marketed from Alaska products of the value of $446,000,000. That is a great sum; and yet the State from which What are the Alaskan products which produced these millions? The fisheries brought $148,000,000 The fisheries brought $148,000.000 of the amount. As stated, the fish are secured in navigable waters, and do not require the railroad. They are caught by means of enormous seines drawn by tugboats. Comparatively few men are required to perform this labor, and practically no white men are engaged in the work. These fish canneries are owned by corporations, who send vessels up from San Francisco laden with supplies and with Japanese, Chinese, and other laborers to do the work. When the canning season is over the entire product is shipped and the crews and workmen disappear until the following year. Nothing in that to require a Government-built railroad, is there?

In the time we have owned Alaska she has contributed $73,000,000 worth of furs to the market. These furs nearly all come from Pribilof Islands. The fact is a few natives live on these islands and secure the skins of the seals for the Government lessees, who in turn sell the furs. We have passed a law to stop killing these seals to a large extent. No matter how many Government railroads we had in Alaska, none of the seal-skins would be shipped by rail, for they are secured in navigable water, the cheapest transportation in the world.

In all the years we have owned Alaska that Territory has produced $168,000,000 gold, not quite enough to pay the war pensions for 12 months. But this gold does not require railroad transportation. Practically all of it is mined near the coast. The gold production in Alaska year before last was $22,000,000, and last year it had fallen to $18,000,000. Of course, this gold production is a good thing and helps to sustain the world's supply of basic money, but it costs a dollar to mine every dollar of gold that is produced in Alaska or elsewhere. The miner digs it out of the ground, hands it to the Government, the Government mints it into the form of money, hands it back to the miner, and the taxpayer who gets it has to work for it. And, of course, that same principle applies to all that we get from Alaska, whether gold, furs, fish, copper, or coal.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the United States own about 95

Mr. Chairman, the people of the United States own about 95 per cent of all the land there is in Alaska, and its area is about one-fifth of that of the United States. In recent years we have inaugurated and are now pursuing a course in Alaska which to my mind is little short of idiotic. The cry of conservation swept the American people off their feet. As in the case of a great many good reforms, we went too far, and as a result we bottled Alaskan resources up completely.

For one, I am heartily in favor of opening up Alaska as rapidly as the interests of the American people demand it. I would permit every American citizen who wanted to go to farming in Alaska to have as much land as he could use in his business. would lease the mineral and coal lands upon such conditions as would render monopolization impossible. With the Territory thus opened up. I have no doubt that railroads and other transportation facilities would be constructed as rapidly as profitable tonnage was at hand. Under such circumstances railroads would be built in Alaska wherever they would remunerate the builders for the money spent, and at such places as railroads would not be profitable I am unwilling to issue bonds to build them at public expense. It is very probable that the greater part of Alaska is not ready for development. Much of its soil will no doubt lie in frozen virginity until time is no more. the years to come, when our population becomes dense, it may be that our remote posterity will be driven to dare the migration to this land of glaciers, but that time, Mr. Chairman, I am happy to believe, is far remote.

The white population of Alaska is only 30,000. This bill, which has grown from $35,000,000, as first presented, to $40,000, 000, as we now consider it, appropriates more than $1,000,000 for each 1,000 of the white population of Alaska. 000 is just a starter. No one can doubt that if we embark upon the governmental construction of railroads in Alaska it will require many hundreds of millions before we get through with it. So it was with the Panama Canal, so it has been with all Government undertakings, and so it will be with this affair. The estimates for the work in Panama was $135,000,000. We have already gone far enough to see that it will cost $500,000,000. The engineers who examined this Alaska scheme have already submitted plans and specifications for railroads up there which they admit would require an outlay of $478,000,000. What will we do with these railroads when we get them built? The Government owns the coal land, and gentlemen tell us that it will never do for the Government to lease these coal lands to private individuals. What, then, can the Government do with these coal lands after railroads are built to them? Let the Government operate the coal mines, you say. Many of the advocates of this bill are already openly advocating Government operation of the coal mines in Alaska. Of course that follows inevitably if we refuse to sell or lease the property. But if the Government had the railroads built and the coal mines open, what would we do with the coal? We have enough at home to last us 7,000 years, and the Alaska coal is not suitable for the Navy, even if the Navy wanted to use coal. Would not the Government ultimately have to go into the manufacturing business in order to use the coal?

But when you get the advocates of this bill in a tight place they fall back upon the wonderful agricultural possibilities of Alaska. Happily we are not in the dark about farming in that country. The Government has been doing a little farming in Alaska for a number of years. We have spent $298,000 of the people's money in the farming business up in Alaska, by way of experiment, and the returns up to date have been $22,000. Your Uncle Samuel is about the only farmer I know of who could stand that kind of farming very long at a time. Of course our Government farm managers in Alaska are enthusiastic over the possibilities of that country. We are paying them large salaries and they can gratify their agricultural curiosity without stint. These Government farmers in Alaska are learned men, and I have no doubt that they are thoroughly honest and patriotic. But not one of them could make a living farming. We professional men shine as farmers as long as we have a good income on the side to help things out, but the real farmers, those who pay our salaries, have to get up and hustle to make a living even upon good land in a good farming country. I know what I am talking about, for I am supporting a farm right now. It is only a small farm, it is true, but it knocks a right sharp hole in my salary check every month to keep it going.

What do our Government farmers say of Alaska? Chubbuck, who has charge of one of the experimental farms up there, says in a recent official report:

On the south coast, where the climate is mild, tillable land is scarce, because of the proximity of the mountains to the shore line; elsewhere in Alaska the winters are long and very cold.

Yes; the winters are very long in Alaska. They have, in fact, eight months of very severe winter there. During those eight winter months the sun does not rise until 10 o'clock in the morning, and it sets at from 3 to half past 3 o'clock in the True, in the summer months, some three or four in number, the sun shines nearly all the time, but even at that it takes an entire summer to thaw out a piece of cultivated land 2 or 3 feet below the earth's surface. The land in its natural state is covered with moss several feet thick, and will not thaw out at all in summer unless this moss is removed. is frozen as deep down into the earth as anyone has been They have gone down 200 feet into the able to penetrate. earth and found nothing but blue ice.

The cost of clearing land in Alaska is variously estimated at from $125 to $200 per acre. It costs the Government in excess of the latter sum to clear the land required for the experimental farms, but this is accounted for by the fact that the Government pays its farm hands in Alaska $7.50 and that private farmers get their labor cheaper. This is the report of our expert farmers, and I am prepared to believe it, for under our very noses here in the Capitol the Government pays at least twice as much for service as is paid by private employers. Not only is that true, but when one of our employees die we bury him at Government expense and let his salary run on six months after he is dead.

What about the fertility of Alaskan soil after it is cleared and thawed out deep enough to cultivate? I will let Prof.

Chubbuck answer.

As already stated, generally speaking, Alaskan soil holds but limited supply of available plant food. They soon become exhauste and the problem is how to increase this limited store of plant food.

Prof. Chubbuck suggests several remedies for the sterility of these Alaskan soils, and one of these remedies is to allow the land to lie out every other year. Of course I have no idea in the world how a farmer could make a living farming in Alaska; but if such a thing were possible he certainly would have an easy time of it with only three months of growing season every year and his land lying out every other year; the balance of the time he could go to bed at dark, which comes on at about 3 o'clock in the evening, and rise with the sun the next morning, which would be in the neighborhood of 10 o'clock a. m. Nothing would remain to be desired by such a farmer except for the Government to give him a pension, which, of course, it would be absolutely necessary for him to have in order to buy food and clothing.

Mr. Chairman. I have not reached the decision to vote against this measure hastily. Many of our party leaders are supporting this bill, and it appears to be meeting with favor throughout the country. Under these circumstances I have felt it to be my duty to investigate the proposition most thoroughly. I have looked at it from every angle, followed it through the tortuous maze of lengthy reports, and read many hundreds of pages for and against its enactment. In every aspect of the proposition I can only see new burdens to be borne by the taxpayers of this land.

Why, sir, only 27 per cent of the tillable land in the United States is in a state of cultivation. We have countless millions of acres yet in a state of nature awaiting but the hand of labor to bring forth abundant yields. The worst of these wild acres is a better farming proposition than the best there is in Alaska. Why, then, is 73 per cent of the tillable lands in the United States standing idle? It must either be that there is not sufficient demand for farm products, not sufficient hands to work the land, or not sufficient railroads and dirt roads to open up these wild acres and handle the product of the soil. In either case no better reason can or need be given for the folly of the proposition to build railroads in Alaska. If the Government must embark in the business of building railroads, which I oppose, why not build them here at home, where our people can use them in developing wild lands which are naturally and admirably adapted to the maintenance of a prosperous and happy citizenship? We need more railroads all over the South and West. Not only do we need railroads, but we need good country roads to intersect these railroads that we already have to enable the people to get the products of their toil to market.

In my own district in Texas we have hundreds of thousands of acres of the best farming land in the world that never had a plow in it. These lands can be purchased at from $10 to $25 per acre. They are comparatively easy to bring into a state of We have a long growing season and mild winters. Fuel is plentiful and water is pure and abundant. Less than 10 per cent of these lands are in a state of cultivation. Railroads are needed and country roads are needed to open up this What is true of my section is true of almost the entire South and, in part, of many other sections of the United States. Under these circumstances, how can I go back to the people who sent me here and excuse myself for writing a $40,000,000 mortgage against the property of the United States for the purpose of building railroads in Alaska?

If gentlemen will turn to page 417 of the 1912 Yearbook of Agriculture, they will find a very interesting article there from the pen of Mr. Jay A. Bonsteel, scientist in the Soil Sur-They will find from this article that the best trucking soils in the United States are along the Atlantic and Gulf coasts; that there are from thirty to fifty million acres of one series of this soil known as the Norfolk series, and that not one-tenth of 1 per cent of these lands are devoted to truck farm-More than 80 per cent of these soils have never been touched by the plow. In this article you will find a picture of a piece of this land in its natural state, and under this picture you will find these words:

Worth less than $10 per acre in this condition, but capable of producing $1,000 worth of truck crops per acre in a single year.

That particular land is in eastern North Carolina, but the soil survey shows that it is almost identical with the predominant soil in eastern Texas. Now, sir, there are but two reasons why this land is lying idle to-day; one is the limited demand for the food products which they will produce in such great abundance and the other is the want of transportation facilities. With all these millions of acres lying idle at home, pray, tell me where is the logic, where the wisdom of organizing a Dr. Cook expedition to icebound Alaska in search of a place to grow potatoes?

But it is well for the country to understand that this appropriation is but an entering wedge not only as to railroad building in Alaska but as to the activity of the Government in many schemes of like import. One is not compelled to go far to find advocates in Congress and out of it for every socialistic nostrum that the nebulous intellects of the past and present have con-

A Senator of the United States from one of the Western States. who aided very largely in the passage of this bill through the Senate, made the purpose of the bill quite clear in the following statement, made in the course of a speech in the Senate the other day. He said:

We do not propose to build these roads simply to get coal. If that were the sole purpose, we could build a line to the Bering River fields, equip it, construct docks and terminals, and make a harbor for not exceeding $4,000,000, and have access to all the coal we need for many years to come, not only for Government purposes but to supply the needs and demands of the Pacific coast. * * In the bill which I introduced I provided for the reservation of a certain coal area and its development by the Government.

The Senator who gave utterance to his desire for the Government to enter the coal-mining business is recorded as a Republican. On the same day, or rather in the same issue of the Congressional Record, I find the speech of another Senator, who proposes a remedy for poverty. This Senator is recorded who proposes a remedy for poverty. This Sen as a Democrat. His proposition is as follows:

Let the Government of the United States annually acquire, by purchase if necessary, 50,000 small farms throughout the various States as may be most suitable and practicable, build commodious dwelling houses thereon, and each year place 50,000 citizens, without any expense or cost to such citizens, into actual possession of these farms, carefully providing that these "home-reserve farm lands" shall not be allenated, hypothecated in any way, or transferred under any pretext by the citizen inducted therein.

* * These tracts of land, with decent dwelling houses, could be provided at an average cost to the Government of about $4,000 per farm.

A little while are seven and discovered or thinks be did that

A little while ago some one discovered, or thinks he did, that radium is beneficial in the treatment of cancer. Immediately a bill was introduced in Congress to have the Government take over the radium mines and pay the owners of these mines some hundred millions or so as the purchase price.

Within the past few days the Post Office Department has strongly recommended the Government ownership of the telephone lines. I have not yet had an opportunity to examine the official report, but from the press copy I find the following:

According to the best available data the capitalization of the long distance and toll lines represents approximately $200,000,000, and the capitalization of the entire commercial network approximately $900,000,000.

I also gather from this report, Mr. Chairman, that the Government ownership of these lines would increase the number of persons employed in the Postal Service from 290,000 persons to about 500,000 persons. It is, no doubt, still fresh in the minds of many of my colleagues that less than a week ago an amendment, known as the Reilly amendment, was ingrafted upon the Post Office appropriation bill providing that the Government should furnish free life and accident insurance to about 90,000 employees of the Postal Service, including rural and city carriers and others. My effort to defeat this proposition, though vigorously made, was unavailing. It is now insistently pro-posed to provide pensions for all the civil-service employees of the Government. The former President of the United States recommended that they receive a pension.

A mother's-pension law has been written into the statutes of several States of the Union, and a bill is pending before Congress to give the proposition national scope.

An old-age pension bill has been pending in Congress for several years, and is being urged now with renewed vigor.

Mr. Speaker, we are being swept off our feet by a clamor which, in my judgment, does not proceed from the mind and heart of the great body of the American people. Are we ready to cast away the sober democracy of our fathers for the hybrid faith of paternalistic State socialism? Is there nothing good left in the individualism under which this Republic has grown so great? I grant you there has been enormous abuses. Corporate wealth and individual wealth has been stacked mountain high by the fraudulent flotation of fictitious stocks and bonds. The public has been saddled with burdens without a corresponding benefit. Men have reaped where they never sowed. I grant you all. But the fault has not been so much with the law as with lethargic public opinion and the men whom the people delegated to execute the law. But public opinion has been awakened with a shock. With one mind we are all determined to correct these abuses. Much has already been accomplished. We have rewritten the tariff laws in the interest of the people; we have enacted a graduated income tax; we have taken the national banking system from private hands and placed it under Government control; we have broken the op-pressive monopoly of the express companies with the people's parcel-post system; and we are very shortly going to write into the statutes of this Nation a law forbidding the formation or operation of trusts and monopolies, All this and more has been done. We are marching in unbroken ranks to the realization of the people's hopes. In this state of our affairs let us not become panic-stricken or hysterical. There is both good and bad in our established laws and policies. Let us not strike with the fury of enraged blindness, smiting both good and evil with indiscriminate hand. No good reform movement was ever blasted by reactionaries. We need not fear them. They are powerless to stay the righteous hand of the people's will. many good reforms have been destroyed by excessive zeal. There are few good things in this world that do not become evil when carried to extremes. Mr. Jefferson declared that he found it more difficult to hold back into bounds of safety the overardent friends of liberty than to bring to proper advancement those who doubted the wisdom of popular government.

Public men are just now running to and fro as if they had been awakened to a disaster at sea. In good truth, the old ship has struck some rocks, but she is yet sound in her vital parts. She has sprung a leak here and there, but these can be stanched by cool and statesmanlike wisdom. There are many barnacles clinging to her bottom and pirates swarm her decks. But she is a good ship, this constitutional democracy of ours. The world has never witnessed her equal. For more than a hundred years she has rolled in safety through every storm and risen triumphantly from every shock. Shall we jump overboard now and give up the ship because, forsooth, there are leaks in the hold and pirates on the deck? How will we improve our condition by forsaking the old ship for the frail and leaky craft of socialism? For one, I prefer to throw the pirates overboard and stay with the ship. If she needs repair, I am ready with a stout heart to begin the work; and if we have not the courage, the strength, and the patriotism to do that, how will it be with us when we are aboard this new vessel, into which we are in a fair way to embark the history, the hopes, and the destiny of the people of this great land? If we flee from pirates, will they not pursue? Will not these and other barnacles gather upon the new ship, and in greater abundance? Will not plunderers be more numerous under the new system than the old? No, Mr. Chairman; the fault is not with the form and substance of our institutions but with abuses which it lies within our power to correct. I confess that I am alarmed at the feverish haste of gentlemen to increase and extend the activities of the Federal Government. Already Government employees muster an army ten times as numerous as followed Lee or Grant. Already they are organized for more pay and shorter hours, free life and accident insurance, and a Government pension to retire upon. Already they are sufficiently numerous and strong to give the average Congressman the buck ague when their interests are involved.

What will it be when the Government enters upon the operation of coal mines, oil wells, radium mines, refineries, railroads, telephones, manufacturing plants, and other suggested Federal activities?

It is just as well that the people who do not have an opportunity to view the details of governmental operations at close range should understand the inner workings of the great and necessary but altogether clumsy machine called government. It is well to understand that whatever the Government requires must be paid for at a much more expensive rate than private persons are under the necessity of paying. For instance, the Government requires many horses in the service, and to shoe these horses costs the Government anywhere from two to ten times as much as the ordinary individual has to pay. I remember some years ago to have served upon a committee in this House called the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department. Among other things that came out I remember that the expense of keeping one horse in that department properly shod cost the Government something like $50 a year. It costs the Government $25 and sometimes more per month to board its horses. It is generally understood that the Government will pay the top price for all it buys, and be content with the bottom price for all it sells.

Nearly the entire army of Government employees are now covered into the civil service. What does that mean? Nothing short of a job for life. What will we do with these employees when they grow old and are no longer able to do the work required of them by the Government? That question can be answered by a visit to the departments here in Washington. There you will find men and women tottering with age, scarcely able to stand alone, drawing their salaries and doing nothing to earn them. But why is this? you inquire. Because many of these old men and women have neglected to provide for old age, and now that they are old the heads of the departments have not the heart to kick them out into the street. This is the meat of the argument for civil pensions.

And what will it be when we pension this army of Government employees? Here again we do not have to look about us long for examples of the way the pension system grows. The Civil War is 50 years behind us, but there are three times as many names on the pension rolls as there were 20 years after the war. They first put on the pension rolls the soldiers who needed a pension, then all the soldiers, then their wives, then their parents, and finally their children. Civil War pensions have already amounted to more than forty hundred million dollars, and we pass private pension bills every two weeks. A more recent example can be found in the case of Spanish War pensions. Only a few hundred were killed on our side in that war, and the wounded was quite a short list, and yet the annual pension roll on account of that war now amounts to something over forty-two millions. The war of 1812 is a century behind us, but we are still paying pensions on account of that war.

Will not the employees of the Government soon be strong enough to make Congress give them pensions? And once they secure their demand will not the history of war-pension legislation repeat itself in the matter of the civil list? What, then, would be the fate of a Congressman who dared to stand between the countless horde of pensioners and the Public Treasury? He would be drawn, quartered, and cremated. Yea, he would be decapitated without the benefit of clergy.

And who is to pay for all these radium mines, railways, and telephones, anyway, and how is the payment to be made? The Government of the United States never has a dollar except as it taxes it out of the pockets of the people. In fact, the Gov-ernment is the people in organized form. "But bonds will be issued," say our cheerful doctors. What is a Government bond, pray tell me, except a mortgage given by the people upon all that the people own? How is money to be raised to meet the interest on these bonds twice a year? By taxing the people, of course, for the Government has no way of raising money except by taxing the people, unless bonds were issued to pay the interest; but in that case it would not be long until no one could be found who would buy a Government bond.

Mr. Chairman, socialism is the folly and the fad of the hour, and I am sad of heart to see it, not only because I know that it will convert those who come to lean upon the Government into a race of hopeless and spineless dwarfs but because I know that it will strain every muscle and every nerve in the bodies of energetic and independent men to pay the taxes to keep a great army of Government boarders at the public table. The greater part of the parasites that will breed under socialism like insects in the sun will come from the crowded cities. Our manly and independent laborers and our sturdy and frugal farmers will have to feed this hungry horde, and, like the cask of Danaides, it will be impossible to fill them, for their mouths will be ever stretched forth in open supplication, and their clamor will sound like the rush of many waters.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not vote for these nostrums of socialism; believing as I do, I would be worse than a public enemy if I did so.

I love the people of my district. I cherish sacredly the land in which they dwell. I have lived among them since my boyhood, and I shall be buried there. Many of them are my devoted personal friends, and a great majority of them have given me proof that neither the bitter tongue of the slanderer nor the honeved lips of the demagogue can drive them from me. These people, Mr. Chairman, have a right to expect that I will have the courage to consult the public good rather than my political safety. They have a right to expect that I will give studious application to these great public questions and that I will do my duty as that duty appears to me. I can not hope that they will always agree with me upon all great public questions. The will of the people is the all-powerful equation, and I am thankful for it. If the time should come when I am out of tune with my people, they will no doubt bestow their commission upon another more nearly in accord with their views. But in the meantime I pray for courage to sustain me in the discharge of my duty as God gives me the light to see it, for if my strength holds out I shall speak my sentiments and vote my convictions though they slay me. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the distinguished gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. Dies] had lived in Massachusetts in the forties of the last century and represented a constituency from that State in this body at that time, he would have raised his eloquent voice to prove how impossible it would be for a civilized people to live on the arid plains of Texas. [Applause.] And do the two distinguished gentlemen from Oklahoma who have led the fight against this bill need to be reminded that 100 years ago the United States entered into a solemn treaty providing that it never would incorporate the region they now represent, either into a State or a Territory of the United States, but turning it over to the Indians, and considering it valueless for white men? [Applause and laughter.]

Such has been the history of our country. At every step which has been made we have been told that the Constitution was strained, that self-government was at stake, and that the legislation we were about to enact would prove destructive of the principles of our Government. Even in the short space of half a generation, during which I have had the honor to occupy a place in this body, I can recall numerous instances when I have heard the same speeches in opposition to other measures that I have heard in opposition to this measure.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman never has heard any speeches in opposition to such a bill as this, because we have never had such a bill as this before.

Mr. MANN. Well, let us see. When Col. William P. Hepburn, a great statesman, first proposed that the Government of the United States construct the Panama Canal as a Government venture, the same dire prophecies were exploited here and elsewhere which the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma now exploits in reference to another governmental un-dertaking of somewhat similar character. [Applause.] We provided in the end for the construction of the Panama Canal by the Government, for the reason that we believed it would not be safe to trust it to construction by private enterprise, which could not afford to undertake it unless guaranteed great profits; and we believed it wiser for the Government to do this. Who would change it now? Where now can you find the men who then denounced it as an act of socialism?

When some years ago we proposed to provide for a new Department of Commerce and Labor, the same dire prophecies occurred about the extravagant results to the Government. When we proposed here to pass the pure-food law, gentlemen said we were destroying the Constitution, that we were ruining the principles of our Government.

When we passed the white-slave law, gentlemen said it was destructive of every principle of government. When we have extended the work of the Agricultural Department, gentlemen have said, "This is pure socialism, the Government entering into private affairs and giving private help to the citizens of the United States.'

The same dire prophecies have been made every time. They will continue to be made as long as government exists.

It is well that the opposition side is presented to these propositions, because we ought to hear both sides, upon the principle that a legislative body which has not the ability to determine what to do in a specific case, but is fearful of what it may want to do in some other case, and decides not on the question before it but on the fears it has for the future, that legislative body is unworthy to exist. [Applause.] Now, what are the facts? I am not unduly impressed even with the possibilities of Alaska. I am not unduly impressed with the fertility of the soil or the value of the coal, or the amount of gold which is procured from there, or the other industries which may exist or which may be developed in the future. That is something we may argue about. No one can tell. No one knows. When I was a boy going to the public school, on the map there was the great American Desert, and I was taught to believe, as other children of my age were taught to believe at that time, that out in the West there laid a region where it was impossible for men to live, comparable only with the Desert of Sahara. And yet in my short life-and I am still a young man [applause]-I have lived to see this desert bloom and blossom. I recall that when we had before us the bill to provide for Government construction in aid of the irrigation of arid lands the same dire prophecies were made that are made now.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. MANN. Yes.
Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman from Illinois think that if he had plenty of time he could give any justification for the expenditure of sixty millions of money within the last year?

Mr. MANN. I could. Mr. FERRIS. What part of it? Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman has had three or four hours on this question and I have only a few minutes, and yet he expects me to go into a matter of that kind. I recall that when a distinguished gentleman of great ability in this House made a speech against the irrigation bill because he believed that the farmers of his district were so narrow minded that they wanted to keep out new lands and occupancy by settlers raising new products, I went to the gentleman, who was a friend of mine, and suggested to him that he leave that speech out of the RECORD, because it would live to plague him. He left it out of the Record, and the next time he was a candidate for Congress a newspaper, which had opposed him theretofore, came out one day with a broadside favoring his reelection because he had helped to pass the irrigation bill, and appealing to the farmers to stand by him, and they did. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, what is the situation? We own Alaska; it is undeveloped and its resources are unknown. If one of us owned Alaska and had the power, what would the owner do? If I owned Alaska, what would I do? Give it away? No. Sell it? No. No one would know what is its value. Handle it and develop it yourself. What would be the first step of development? What has been the first step in development anywhere in the United States within the last 50 years? To build a railroad. [Applause.] And as the owner of Alaska we propose to build a railroad as the first step of development. We must also learn the value of Alaska. We would not give it away. We would not sell it; we could not afford to do that, and if we keep it we must find out the resources which are there, and, as men of common sense, we should develop our own property by making it possible to learn the resources, and the first step is to build a railroad. [Applause.]

Gentlemen decry Government ownership of property. question is not before us. The Government owns a great deal of property. The Government owns a great many and the Government is engaged in charge of work. When it was proposed to pass the parcel-post bill, why, gentlemen had all sorts of fits over the subject. Who is there now so brave on the floor of this House as to propose to do away with the parcel post? I yield to him to rise and show his face.

Mr. KINDEL. I do. Mr. MANN. I am glad to know that the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KINDEL] is opposed to the parcel-post law. Mr. KINDEL. As it stands, it is a subterfuge and a fraud.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says he is opposed to the parcelpost law, but the gentleman is really in favor of making it stronger. No; we hear these prophecies. We are engaged in more or less Government activities, but because we are engaged in one does not bind us to do all. Because we adopt one proposition does not bind us to adopt all propositions. We should consider each one on its merits, and a legislative body that can not do that is not able to worthily legislate for the people. I 50 years.

believe that we ought to do fairly not only by Alaska but we ought to do fairly by our own constituencies and our own country in developing the resources which belong to them and I believe that we ought to pass this bill authorizing the President to construct this railroad within the narrow limits

[Applause.] .

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, for nearly half a century we have owned and controlled the great Territory of Alaska. Purchased for an insignificant sum of money, it has already added to the wealth of the Nation $470,000,000 worth of products. We have barely touched the surface. We do not know yet what treasures that great Territory, one-fifth as large as continental United States, still conceals from the world. But we do know in this progressive part of the opening of this new century that our duty to ourselves, our duty to the rest of the world, demands that we now unlock the treasures of this great section of the earth's surface. [Applause.]

We have the best of reasons for believing that the coal fields there are greater than the coal fields of Pennsylvania; that the marble possibilities are greater than those of Vermont, and we are beginning to understand from investigations made by our Agricultural Department that there are agricultural possibilities in that great Territory of ours.

Between the sixtieth and seventieth parallels of latitude in Europe lie the countries of Norway, Sweden, Finland, and the Provinces of northern Russia, and there are 11,000,000 people living there who are self-supporting. When we exported foodstuffs-when we produced more than enough for ourselveswe did not send any of it to that part of the world. Corn from the Argentine Republic is not going there now. Chilled beef from Australia is not going to this section of Europe. They are producing there all the foodstuffs that the 11,000,000 people who live there consume. They have established stable governments; they have built great cities, splendid public buildings, while from the ports of Norway sail the great fleets of black merchant ships that carry so much of the commerce of our own country. We have not been making agricultural experiments in Alaska, as stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies], for nearly

Only a little over six years ago in a small way our Agricultural Department commenced to make experiments there, When I want to find out something about the possibilities of Alaskan farming I do not intend to depend too much upon the advice of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies], who admits that even down there in Texas, in that fertile section of the world, where the sunshine is abundant, he is a failure as a farmer. [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman from Texas reminds me of Daniel Webster. Daniel Webster was a great orator. He was a brilliant statesman, but he often made mis-The gentleman from Texas is not a great orator nor a brilliant statesman-he will admit that himself-but he makes mistakes oftener than Daniel Webster ever did or ever could. [Laughter.] Why, when we were talking about adding to our territory forever the great agricultural section of the Northwest, the Oregon country, that section out of which we have now carved three great States, when from the interior of the Oregon country there came from the few settlers who lived there the demand that we take care of our own, when Daniel Webster and the other statesmen of that time were intent upon protecting just a few hundreds of acres of woodland upon the Maine border-when these demands came from settlers in the Oregon country Daniel Webster made a speech with reference to that section of the country, its worthless character for agricultural purposes, its ice and its snows and its undesirability from every standpoint, that reminds me very much of the speech made this afternoon by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies], and I want to read now what Daniel Webster had to say about Oregon a little over three-quarters of a century ago. Daniel Webster said:

What do we want with this vast worthless area, this region of savages and wild beasts, of deserts, of shifting sands and whirlwinds of dust, of cactus and prairie dogs? To what use could we ever hope to put these great deserts or these endless mountain ranges, impenetrable and covered to their base with eternal snow? What can we ever hope to do with the western coast, a coast of 3,000 miles, rock-bound, cheerless, and uninviting, and not a harbor on it? What use have we for such a country? Mr. President, I will never vote one cent from the Public Treasury to place the Pacific coast one inch nearer to Boston than it is now.

Daniel Webster's claim to statesmanship does not, of course, rest upon that speech, and in the future the claims of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies] to statesmanship will not rest on the speech he made here this afternoon. But, Mr. Chairman, the demand for the Oregon country continued, and finally resulted in establishing forever our claims to that great section of the world. The years passed; the British attempted settlements in Oregon. Whitman and Lovejoy undertook in the dead of winter their journey to the Capitol through the snows and the ice of the Northwest, and when they arrived here, describing the possibilities there, opinion had not changed much, apparently, because the Senators from South Carolina and other States were making just the same kind of speeches that we hear to-day against the development of Alaska. Senator McDuffie, following Senator Calhoun, of South Carolina, made a speech which reads very much like the minority report of the committee in this case, and 20 years from now the speeches made against Alaska here will sound just as amusing as the extracts from the speech of Senator McDuffie, which I propose now to read. The Senator, replying to Senator Benton, and speaking of the Oregon country, said:

Has the Senator

He demanded of Senator Benton-

He demanded of Senator Benton—
examined the character of the country? As I understand it, about 700 miles this side of the Rocky Mountains is unhabitable, where rain scarcely ever falls, a barren, sandy soil. There are three successive ridges of mountains extending toward the Pacific and running nearly parallel, which mountains are totally impassable except in certain parts, where there are gaps or depressions to be reached only by going some hundreds of miles out of the direct course. Well, now, what are we to do in such a case as this? How are you going to apply steam? Have you made anything like an estimate of the cost of a railroad from here to the mouth of the Columbia? Why, the weaith of the Indies would be insufficient! You would have to tunnel through mountains 500 or 600 miles in extent.

It is true they have constructed a tunnel beneath the Thames, but at a vast expenditure of capital. With a bankrupt Treasury and a depressed and suffering people, to talk about constructing a railroad to the western shore of the continent manifests a wild spirit of adventure which I never expected to hear broached in the Senate of the United States. And is the Senate of the United States to be the last intrenchment where we are to find this wild spirit of adventure which has involved the country in ruin? I believe that the farmers, the honest cultivators of the soil, look now only to God in His mercy and their own labor to relieve them from the wretchedness in which the wild and visionary schemes of adventure have involved them. * * Why, sir, of what use will this be for agricultural purposes? I would not, for that purpose, give a pinch of snuff for the whole territory. I wish to God we did not own it! I wish it was an impassable barrier to secure us against the intrusion of others. This is the character of the country. Whom are we to send there? Do you think your honest farmers in Pennsylvania, New York, or even Ohio or Missouri will abanden their farms to go upon any such enterprise as this? God forbid! To any man w

Senator McDuffie's study of the Oregon question extended over some years. He gave to the matter much more attention and study than the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies] has given to Alaska, and if his investigations led him to such conclusions as this, great God! what sort of conclusions would the gentleman from Texas have reached if he had studied the Alaskan question as long as Senator McDuffle studied the Oregon question? He continues:

He continues:

If the British had no claim to this territory, and there was nothing which impelled us to go with our military establishments and agricultural settlements, I would not consent, if there was an embankment of even 5 feet to be removed, to enable any population to go there. I do not wish to tempt the people to settlements there. I wish this to be a great empire, grown up by the natural course of civilization, and the natural extension of population. I thank God, in His mercy, for placing the Rocky Mountains there. I believe if it had not been for those mountains we would have been already in the Pacific. You can not civilize men if they have an indefinite extent of territory over which to spread their numbers; for so long as they spread their numbers instead of becoming civilized they become semisavage. All agree that civilization can be best effected where the country is hedged in by narrow boundaries. narrow boundaries.

Now, all that we ask permission to do is to build there a pioneer railroad—a railroad connecting the open harbors of the south with the waters of the great navigable rivers of the interior of Alaska, connecting its valleys with all their possibilities, and who will say that between the sixtieth and seven-tieth parallels of latitude in Alaska you can not raise just as much as you can between the sixtieth and seventieth parallels of latitude in Europe, where these millions of people live in comfort and prosperity and happiness?

This bill contemplates a bond issue in order to provide the money with which to build these trunk-line railroads. We developed the great West by giving away land. We gave to the Northern Pacific Railroad at one time 43,000,000 acres of land, and in spite of the dire prophecies of Webster, and of Calhoun, and of McDuffie, the railroads were built. Great bands of steel reached the western sea, and the population in its westward movement across the continent followed them and developed those great States and brought them, in spite of Webster, very near, indeed, to Boston [Applause.]

Canada is doing the very thing we are trying to accomplish in this bill. She is building railroads up there herself, some of them extending in the direction of the Territory of Alaska, with Government aid, Government bonds, for over 2,000 miles of railway. We are told in the daily press she has just completed a lease for nearly 1,800 miles of railroad which she now has under construction, by the terms of which the rental to be paid for the use of that railroad will pay the interest on her entire railroad-aid bond issue. It is not too much to expect that the building of these pioneer railroads up there in Alaska will never be a charge on the people of the United States or upon the Treasury of the United States.

Webster and Calhoun and McDuffie can perhaps be pardoned for the position they took with reference to the Oregon country. Their opportunities for information as to the possibilities of that country depended merely upon reports of the few settlers who lived there. I am unable to reach the conclusion that those gentlemen who on this floor so vigorously opposed this proposition are entitled to the same consideration. ties for information as to Alaska and its possibilities are ample, There are frozen rivers and long nights and high mountains covered with snow and cold winters in those sections of Europe between the sixtieth and seventieth parallels of latitude, just as there are in Alaska, and yet people live there, millions of people, happy, prosperous, contented. We have taken $470,000,000 worth of products in less than 50 years from Alaska, and to-day less than 40,000 white people live there. Without a proper system of railroads we can not expect a larger population.

Roads are a necessity for the development of every land. Roman generals at the head of Roman legions carried the Roman rule to remote sections of the known world, but back of the great crushing armies of Rome came her road builders, building hundreds of miles of good roads—the best roads the world had ever seen. Some of them exist to this day. Government aid for railroads is not an unknown thing in the United States. The pioneer western roads—the Union Pacific and the Northern Pacific-were built on account of Government aid. Enormous land grants made possible the completion of those roads and the speedy development of the western part of our continent in spite of the predictions of the legislators of that period. It is estimated by competent writers, excellent authorities on the subject, that in lands and in moneys, the States and the National Government have given in aid of railroad building in continental United States over $1,000,000,000. Competent authorities writing on the subject estimate that the donations of lands and moneys to railroads in continental United States amount, in the aggregate, to two-fifths of all the value of railroad properties in the United States to-day. We have built over 16,000 miles of railroad with Government aid.

There are only three things to do with Alaska and the time has come when we must do something. We must deliver over the Territory to the Guggenheims and the other interests who clamor for it; we must give it back to Russia, which, in my judgment, would be preferable to giving it to these interests, or the National Government must provide for its development. This is the method of developing Alaska which I stand for and which I believe the majority of the people of the United States stand for to-day. We can only develop a country by building roads, by building the best roads, roads which transport persons and property quickly, and in this age of the world railroads are the only kind of roads that answer this requirement. We aided by land grants only the Northern Pacific and the Union Pacific Railroads, but the other railroads followed without national aid and now a network of railroads covers the entire western part of this continent. Canada is building railroads and is issuing bonds in aid of railroads. Under the direction of the Canadian Government a railroad is being built now toward the great Northwest, penetrating the colder regions of the Northrailroad that will reach, when it is completed, almost to the When, under the direction of the President of Arctic Circle. the United States, the roads we are providing for in this bill are completed but a comparatively small gap will remain between the Alaskan system of railroads and the Canadian system of railroads, and it is not too much to expect that in the not too distant future an entire-rail route will exist from the great cities of our Atlantic coast to the interior of the Territory of Alaska.

Acting under the direction of the great departments of this Government, investigations have been conducted in Alaska. We know from the reports of these investigations that there is, in this great Territory, of water power as much as there is in all the Pacific Coast States. Alaska produces as much gold per annum as California, our greatest gold State. There is contained within the boundaries of this Territory more arable land than there is within the entire State of Oregon. Ten years ago we started in Alaska with a small herd of reindeer; how there are 47 great herds numbering in all 38,000 of these animals—food animals, all of them. In time, if these great herds increase in numbers as rapidly as they have increased in the last few years, much can be accomplished in Alaska toward overcoming the cattle shortage in this country. The area of Alaska is equal to the area of Norway, Sweden, Finland, England, Scotland, and Ireland. Within its boundaries there are 100,000 square miles of rich valley lands available as arable and grazing lands. It has been demonstrated that oats, barley, rye, potatoes, and all the vegetables can be successfully grown in Alaska. All the vegetables that can be raised in the Temperate Zone in America will grow as far north as the Arctic Circle and even beyond that, according to the investigations made by this Government.

It will cost the Government less to build this railroad than it would to subsidize with land grants a company to build it. Does anyone doubt the fact that if we gave away these coal fields-even a comparatively small part of them-to the Guggenheims or to other great combinations of capital in this country they would build this road and be glad to build it? The time has passed when any portion of our public domain or any part of the mineral wealth under the soil can be given away to great combinations.

This bill contemplates Government operation of the railroads be built under it during the period of construction. The roads may then be leased, just as Canada has leased the roads she has built; and is it too much to expect that we can lease them as successfully as Canada leases her railroad properties? Is it too much to expect that we also can obtain enough rentals for these properties to pay the interest on the entire bond issue contemplated in this bill, just as Canada has done? We have in Alaska the largest and most productive fisheries in the world. That section of Europe to which I have called attention, and which supports in comfort 11,000,000 people, and which exports its products to other sections of the world, in area is only a little over one-third larger than the Territory of Alaska, but taking into consideration the possibilities of the Alaskan fisheries it is not too much to expect that in Alaska as many people can live and prosper as do live within the same parallels of latitude in Norway and Sweden and Finland and the Russian Provinces.

This is an administration measure, and the measures advocated by this administration are popular. In compliance with the suggestions of a Democratic President, carrying out progressive Democratic policies, in this bill we are taking the first steps toward unlocking the great storehouses of Alaska.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Saunders] is recognized.
Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, this Alaskan proposition is not an appeal to reason, and rests on no solid foundation of assured fact. We are blithely going forth, like the boy in the fable, in quest of the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. In the minds of many, this project is invested with all the glamour that attaches to the far distant the mandatus. that attaches to the far distant, the mysterious, the problematical, or the unknown. So far as the merits of this enterprise are concerned, the essential features are easy of ascertainment, and if this House would pause for a moment, to apply to the matter in hand, the facts that may be readily derived, not from glowing prospectuses, or rhapsodical descriptions of dreamers who are dreaming dreams of an El-Dorado in Alaska, but from the accounts of dispassionate travelers, and the reports of Government officials charged with the duty of investigating, and making report on the resources of this country, it would have no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion adverse to the recommendations of the committee.

Mankind is curiously constituted, and eternally verifying the maxim, quot homines, tot sententiæ.

Bring forward a scheme of governmental construction in some far corner of the earth, in Hawaii, in the Philippines, at Guam, and millions of dollars are voted with a lavish hand. Then submit a commonplace proposition of homely, domestic interest, one that involves no speculative, or problematical elements, but is to be prosecuted under such conditions of assured success, that the results to agriculture, commerce, and industry in every form, may be stated in terms of positive and impressive import, and at once the same people who are ready to construct a railroad into Utopia, or to run a tunnel under Bering Strait, begin to talk in a strain of unfamiliar and unwonted economy. They question whether the party platform covers such a scheme, or perchance hint that it is not within the purview, or contemplation of the Federal Constitution.

I remember that a year or two ago an ingenious gentleman presented to the public a great project, namely, one to cause a deposit upon the Grand Banks, of the sand and other sediment carried by the Labrador current, so as to create in time a great submarine embankment across the banks, thereby deflecting the the Scientific American, and it was even stated that a bill to make the same effective, would be introduced by a Member of Congress. I have often wondered why this has not been done.

Mr. MADDEN. It has been so introduced.
Mr. SAUNDERS. Has it? Well, I am not surprised. I felt assured that a scheme so full of fascinating possibilities, as outlined by its friends, would find supporters in Congress. Who knows what may yet be accomplished, when this enterprise is put on its feet by a liberal appropriation from the Federal Treasury. The flowers that bloom in the spring, may cover the sunny fields of Labrador, and the orange groves of Florida may find formidable rivals in the one-time cheerless wastes of Newfoundland. Before we expend too great a sum in Alaska, we ought to reserve a nest egg for the development of this hopeful enterprise in the turbulent waters that cover the Grand Banks. What is Alaska? The answer may be briefly given: "Alaska is a land of immense distances, great natural obstacles, sparse population. It is 1,500 miles from Ketchi Rau to Bering Straits. The great fjords, arms of the sea; the immense glaciers, Malaspina, 80 miles across; the high mountains, Mount St. Elias, 18,000 feet; Mount Denali, 20,000 feet; the vol-canoes, Katmai, whose ashes tinted Algerian sunsets; the wide and turbulent rivers, Copper, Kuskokwin, Yukon; the extreme cold in the interior, 70° below zero; the rainfall and snowfall, 110 inches at Juneau, all sufficiently exemplify the natural features of this great Territory. The population is about 1 to 20 square miles."

There is so much misconception about this entire situation, and so much misapprehension as to the real facts about climatic and other conditions in Alaska, that I do not deem it amiss in this connection, to refer to conditions in other countries in the older world that are found along the parallels of latitude that run through this portion of the United States. Upon a survey of these conditions, and the achievements of the people in-habiting these areas, we will be able to forecast the likely returns from our expenditure of thirty-five millions in this country. Alaska is practically between the sixtieth and seventieth parallels of latitude. A friend of mine, talking to me a day, or two ago, about this bill, said: "Do you not know that the center of Alaska is in the same latitude as Scotland, and other countries of continental Europe where a great agriculture is successfully prosecuted?" This statement, though made in good faith, is wide of the mark. Examine the globe now in the Hall, and you will find that Mount St. Elias which is in the southern part of Alaska proper, is in the same latitude as northern Labrador. I eliminate, of course, from consideration, the narrow strip which forms the panhandle constituting southeast-Mount St. Elias is far above Scotland. ern Alaska. Mount St. Elias is far above Scotland. The paral-lel running through Mount St. Elias, which is above Sitka, runs through the southern portions of Sweden and Norway, and above Stockholm. Below this parallel are the main agricultural portions of the Scandinavian peninsula.

Now look to central Alaska, Fairbanks, and the Tanana region, and see how they are situated with reference to Greenland, Iceland, and the corresponding countries of the Old World? Bear in mind that this is the region where it is supposed that the great agricultural development will take place. This portion of Alaska is clear above the northern extremity of Labrador. The sixty-fourth parallel of latitude is not a great distance above Fairbanks. This parallel runs through lower Greenland, Iceland, well above Scotland, and thence through Norway and Sweden below the Lofodens, and far above Christiania and Stockholm. Following the same parallel further, we find that it runs across the White Sea, thence by Archangel, and through the frozen portions of Siberia where the Samoyeds and other miserable and abject tribes are found.

Assuredly agriculture has never been pursued with any degree of success, or of profit, or to any considerable extent, in these subpolar areas. It is true that in all of Norway, and Sweden, and Finland, there are many people—millions of peo-Sweden, and Finland, there are many people—millions of people, but comparatively few of them are pursuing lucrative agriculture, above the sixtieth parallel, much less in the latitude of Fairbanks. The inhabitants of these countries trace their history to the very beginning of recorded time, and by untold ages of painful, and protracted toil, have brought their soil to its present measure of cultivation. The existing state of agriculture in those countries is not due to any favoring conditions of soil, or climate, but to strenuous application, prosecuted through countless centuries.

These then are the facts with regard to farming in those lati-tudes of the Old World which correspond to the Fairbanks section of Alaska. Go to Sweden, and you will find that the chief agricultural operations of that country are in the lower portion of the peninsula. The same is true of Norway. Go to Russia, in the area about Archangel, and there is no agriculture worthy of note. Moreover this agriculture such as it is, I finds its roots in prehistoric times. There is no present movement of population into these countries, but on the contrary a steady outward flow, largely into the United States. As far back as history goes, we find the pressure of local conditions inducing emigration from Scandinavia. Knowing nothing of fairer climes, fancying that all the world was as forbidding as their native land, ignorant of life under other conditions of greater opportunity than prevailed at home, their first colonies were established in the northern latitudes.

Iceland was settled from Norway. Later, as the sagas of Iceland inform us, emigrants from that country established themselves in Greenland, and maintained a flourishing colony in that forbidding environment during a long period of time. these migrations have ceased. The colony in Greenland is only a memory. The glories of Iceland have vanished. creasing knowledge, the flow of emigration has turned in other directions. No mileage of railroads in Greenland, or Iceland. or northern Scandinavia would attract colonists and settlers to those countries. The world is wiser now than it was in the days of the Vikings, and there is no movement of population toward Greenland, though lower Greenland is in the latitude of Fairbanks. And yet the advocates of this Alaskan proposition, with full knowledge that even an emigrant from Iceland, or Norway, or Finland, or Sweden, leaving as he would, a settled country, with homes and schools and civilization, could not hope to better his condition as an agricultural pioneer in the bleak interior of Alaska, insist that if we build railroads into that country, a great flow of emigration would set thitherward. Whence would it come? Surely there is no farmer in any State of this Union, living under conditions so untoward, or unhappy, that he would be attracted to a country where the soil is frozen everywhere to bedrock, and land selected for agriculture must be cleared for such limited crops as may be raised, at an expense of from $125 to $200 an acre.

This Alaskan project stands on two legs, coal and agriculture. How about the coal? I think it is but just to the committee to say, that if it had been able to forecast the reports that would be submitted on the coal of Alaska, the present report would not have been made. I find in the committee's report the statement that there are "quantities of naval coal on the route between San Francisco and Yokohama." What are the facts as to this coal? What are the reports from the Navy Department?

The Secretary of the Navy, speaking of coal from the Bering River field, and Dr. Brooks says that there is little to choose between the Matanuska and Bering River coal, states in a recent letter, that "the run of the mine is not fit for naval use." But this coal was submitted to an additional test. It was screened and washed, and then burned. Even under these conditions, the coal used yielded only about 75 per cent of the power secured from Pocahontas coal. Concluding his letter to Mr. Davenport, relating to this test, the Acting Secretary of the Navy wrote as follows: "The department therefore notes with regret, that the Bering River coal sample, has thus far proved unsuitable for naval use." Speaking of this same coal, Dr. Brooks, of the Geological Survey, makes the following statement: "In the physical composition it leaves much to be desired, so far as we know." He further stated that for naval purposes, it might contain too large a percentage of slack. This forecast was verified by the naval tests.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there? The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly, I will yield to my friend.
Mr. HOUSTON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the statement of the Secretary of the Navy in regard to this Bering River coal.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Which Secretary is that? Mr. HOUSTON. Josephus Daniels, Secretary of the Navy. His letter is dated January 31, 1914. He says:

In reference to my previous letter to you in regard to the tests of Bering River coal I desire to invite particular attention to the fact that these tests only relate to the coal actually tested.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Of course. No one would think otherwise, Mr. HOUSTON. The Secretary proceeds:

As stated in my letter, there is nothing to show in the tests just com-pleted what may be expected of coal taken from greater depths on other veins.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Of course the tests can only relate to coal that is actually tested. But a test is made from a sample, and this sample is supposed to be representative of the thing sampled, otherwise what is the value of a test?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. SAUNDERS. This coal was selected for the deliberate purpose of showing that Alaska coal was suitable for naval purposes. But the result was disappointing, deeply disappointing to the advocates of this measure.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. TAGGART. There is an abundance of coal in Alaska, is there not?

Mr. SAUNDERS. There is no doubt about that. Mr. TAGGART. In case it is necessary for the fleet to operate in the Pacific Ocean, there is no coal there with which to operate, and the eastern coal is hauled there. In case of an emergency the coal in Alaska is exactly what the fleet would have to have and would have to use.

Mr. SAUNDERS. To what emergency does the gentleman fer? Is the gentleman lugging the old Japanese war scare into this debate, in order to justify an expenditure of untold millions in Alaska?

Mr. TAGGART. No. But the gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. SAUNDERS. What is the gentleman's question? Mr. TAGGART. Why is a fleet operating in the Pacific or in any other ocean?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The gentleman has not propounded a question that I can answer.

Mr. MADDEN. Is not the latest report of the Navy Department to the effect that the coal brought down from Alaska and tested showed only 43 per cent of the efficiency of the Pocahontas coal?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; and having reference to efficiency, it will be far better to bring suitable coal from the coal fields of the eastern seaboard, than to send our fleet against a hostile fleet in the Pacific, with a supply of inferior and inadequate coal in its bunkers. Of course this is upon the theory that our country is to fight for the control of the Pacific, and that a great naval war in that ocean is inevitable. For one, I scout the suggestion of such a war, and regard it as too improbable for serious consideration.

Now, as to the facts about Alaskan coal and its alleged value for naval use. Mr. Secretary Daniels, with reference to the Bering River coal, has stated that a large sample of this coal was mined for the purpose of testing its value for naval purposes. The results of these tests both as to the run-of-mine coal, and the same coal after being washed and screened, have been furnished. If these tests had been satisfactory, if the coal had met the anticipations of the gentlemen who have spoken in such glowing terms of the possibilities of Alaska, the opponents of this measure would have been confronted at every turn of this debate with the official reports establishing the efficiency of Alaskan coal for naval use. But the unexpected results of these experiments have confounded the advocates of the bill, and they are now seeking to minimize the value to be attached to the official tests.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield? Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

BOOHER. Is the gentleman familiar with the test made three years ago at Bremerton?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No. I prefer to take the latest test, for the obvious reason that this test was devised for the very purpose of ascertaining the value of Matanuska and Bering River coal for naval purposes, and to afford support for this scheme of railway construction in Alaska.

Mr. BOOHER. Was not the Bremerton test made for that purpose also?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know. I am not acquainted with the results of that test.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman know that this coal that was tested last was not mined coal at all? Does he not know that it was just coal taken off the mountain side?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Well, if that is so, such a fact is certainly a reflection upon the people who conducted this test.

Mr. BOOHER. But that is true.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Let us see if it is true. The purpose of the inquiry was to ascertain the value of Alaskan coal for naval purposes. Presumably it was conducted under such conditions that its results would be valuable either in the way of proof, or disproof, of the claims preferred for this coal.

Now you tell me that these tests are valueless, and yet we are expected to rely in other directions upon the representations of a department that is apparently incapable of making an efficient test of bituminous coal. But as a matter of fact Mr. Secretary Daniels states in his letter to Mr. Davenport that a large sample of Bering River coal was mined.

Mr. DIES. That test cost $75,000, did it not?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not know the figures; but surely a department which conducts an inquiry at such an expense, I should not be discredited by its friends. There is no evidence to show that these tests have not been properly made under adequate conditions. I can not agree with the friends of the bill that the conclusions of this expensive inquiry are to be regarded as inconclusive and insufficient.

Mr. FERRIS. Is it not the solemn duty of a gentleman interrupting another gentleman here to present an authority more recent than the December letter from the Navy Department.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Of course it is. I am calling attention to the fact that the tests which have been recently made, are adverse to the claim that Alaskan coal is suitable for naval use. If there is any reliable evidence in its favor, it is certainly the duty of the friends of this measure to present it. We have had too much speculation, too much theory, too much loose talk about the possibilities of Alaska. Above all things, we desire facts, facts, and then more facts. We are more concerned with probabilities, than possibilities, with facts, than with fancies, or highly colored dreams. A test is intended to be an ascertainment of value, and this particular test was ordered for the very purpose of affording material support for this scheme of Alaskan development. The result has been disconcerting. It is a case of being hoisted with one's own petard, and the friends of the bill having recovered from their first astonishment, are seeking to discredit the credibility of their witness. Vain endeavor. Like the fisherman in the Arabian Nights who opened the bottle, and released the malignant genie, they are the authors of their own misfortune. Having invoked this test, they must abide by its issue, and will not be aided by their eager efforts to discredit an ascertainment of their own seeking,

The Secretary of the Navy writes that the experiment shows that the run-of-the-mine from the Bering River field is unsuitable for the use of the Navy. Coal taken from the surface would hardly be styled run-of-mine. There are two horns to this dilemma. Either the test discredits the claims preferred for this coal, or the ability of the Navy Department to make an efficient test, is discredited. Take either horn you choose.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does the gentleman insist that it makes no difference with the value of coal if it is allowed to lie on the ground exposed to the elements for years? Does the gentleman claim that makes no difference?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, no. Of course I do not claim that. Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman has just stated that.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not claim that it makes no difference; but coal of proper value, does not lose that value by lying on the ground for a while.

Mr. HAMLIN. Does it not ever deteriorate?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, to some extent. But I wish to ask you this question. What value do you attach to a test deliberately inaugurated, and conducted at a considerable expenditure by that particular department of the Government which is most vitally interested in the inquiry? When we invoke the results of this test as an argument against the value of Alaskan coal for naval purposes, you gentlemen who favor this bill, wave us airily aside, and in substance declare that the test is valueless, or at least inconclusive. What value is to be attached to any information afforded by a department of the Government if the result of a $75,000 experiment is to be whistled down the wind in this fashion?

If the test had stopped with the run-of-mine coal, you would have said: "Wait until we screen this coal and wash it. is the test which will ascertain its real value. coal had responded to the screen test, you would have been jubilant, and insisted that at last the truth had been revealed. But the last test afforded no better results than the first. What Then if the does the Secretary say in relation to this coal, after both tests had been completed?

The department therefore notes with regret, that the Bering River coal sample has thus far proved unsuitable for naval use.

Are there any more recent tests? If so produce them. Is there any more recent information, or is there any more recent scientific ascertainment reversing the former tests and showing that the Bering coal, or the Matanuska coal is suitable for naval purposes? If not, we must abide by the report of Secretary Daniels.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to another statement in the report which serves to illustrate the character of the arguments that are used to bolster up this Alaskan proposi-First we are told that we need a supply of naval coal in the Pacific. Then in order to justify the construction of railroads to haul this coal to the coast, the report proceeds to afford an estimate of the coal that may be needed in the future, to supply the fighting ships. In addition the report gives the present cost of transportation from Pocahontas to San Francisco. This cost is fixed at from $5 to $8 a ton. Proceeding to multiply the amount of coal required, by the cost of transportation, the committee does not take the average of cost, but uses the maximum of $8, as a multiplier.

In their attempt to estimate the coal needed, they predicate a great war in the Pacific, with some unnamed enemy, presumably Japan. This war is to last 12 months. Now this last hypothesis is absurd. There is no possibility of war in the Pacific with any power, save Japan, and conceding that war with the latter, is a possibility, the United States can not afford to build rail-roads into Alaska, upon the theory of a 12 months' war with that country. The era of protracted naval wars has passed.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that that is an exact quotation from Secretary Myer.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have no doubt that what you say is true. The Secretary was making an argument for a big Navy. His estimate provided for 200,000 tons of coal a month, for 12 months, or a total of 2,400,000 tons of coal. Multiplied by $8 a ton, this made the handsome total of $19,000,000 in round numbers, and furnished a conclusive argument, in the mind of the Secretary, for the development of Alaskan coal. This is a sample big Navy argument, and is apparently cited with approbation by the committee, as justifying the measure submitted, from a military standpoint. I reproduce this feature of the report, merely to show that in this, as in other directions, the suggestions of military necessity are used to afford an excuse for extravagant appropriations. Surely the limit of absurdity has been reached, when the excuse for developing Alaska at an enormous expense rests in large part upon a chimerical war in the Pacific, that is to last for 12 months, and require 2,400,000 tons of coal for naval purposes. The absurdity of this suggestion is made more apparent, when attention is called to the fact that the battle fleets of the future are to burn oil, and not coal.

Mr. HARDY. Is it not the duty of the Government to see if by the development of the Alaskan fields they can not obviate the necessity

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Let me finish the question. Is it not the duty of the Government to see if it can obviate the necessity of hauling Pocahontas or Pennsylvania coal clear around the Horn to it over into the Pacific?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. I am ready to vote for a reasonable appropriation of a few millions to try out the coal fields in Alaska. But the plan submitted contemplates a system of railroads to develop the agricultural possibilities of that country. Our party platform calls for the one, it does not contemplate the other. There are no agricultural possibilities in Alaska.

Mr. HARDY. I am rather inclined to agree with the gentleman, that we can not afford to build that road just for agricul-

Mr. SAUNDERS. Then why do you support a proposition that provides for roads to develop agricultural possibilities below the Arctic Circle.

Mr. HARDY. Because there is an undeveloped wealth of mineral resources there.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Let us see as to the mineral resources. There is of course gold in Alaska, but there is no reliable information as to the amount. It is stated that $18,000,000 of gold came out of Alaska last year. How much of that gold came from Nome, how much from Treadwell, and how much came from that interior to which your railroads are heading? road into interior Alaska to enable miners to prospect for gold that may, or may not be there in paying quantities, does not appeal to our business sense. The road to Fairbanks is designed to develop an agricultural country. It will be an expensive road to construct, and an expensive road to operate. From Chitina to Fairbanks the road will pass through a country that will afford practically no tonnage. Is the outlook for tonnage from the country surrounding Fairbanks any better? the judgment of the committee it is. The Fairbanks-Tanana area is described in the report as the garden spot of Alaska. But this garden spot is not a translated Florida, or California, a land of balmy zephyrs, and perennial bloom. It is farther north than Labrador. It is in the same latitude as Iceland, Greenland, northern Scandinavia, Archangel and the White Sea. The soil is frozen to an unknown depth. I hold in my hand a report by Mr. Seth Mann, who describes himself as the representative of President Wilson on a tour through Alaska, under the auspices of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce.

Describing the agricultural lands of interior Alaska, he says that they are covered with a thick growth of birch, spruce, poplar, aspen and other small timber. As a preliminary step to farming in that country, the homesteader must cut down the small growth, get rid of the roots, and then remove a foot of moss and tundra in order to give the soil that is intended to be cultivated, the first glimpse that it has had of the sun for the ages of ages. This initial expense of preparing the ground runs from $125 to $200 an acre. "A pioneer will have invested in preparation, the total cost per acre of first-class farm land near a good market in an old country, before he will begin to raise anything to sell in this dayless night, and nightless day region."

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Will the gentleman read from Mr. Mann's statement where he has to remove a foot of moss and tundra?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will. Mr. WICKERSHAM. If he so states, that is not the fact.

Mr. SAUNDERS. This report of Mr. Mann was mailed to us in order to influence our votes in favor of this bill. My friend ought not to seek to discredit this witness. He is a witness for the plaintiff, and a friend of this project, though he damns it with faint praise. The following extract is taken from page 12 of Mr. Mann's report:

of Mr. Main's report:

Great level stretches are visible from the boat as one steams down the Yukon and the Tanana. The land is covered with a thick growth of small timber consisting of spruce, birch, poplar, cottonwood, and aspen. Owing to the freezing of the soil in the winter season, the trees in this section have very shallow roots, reaching down only about a foot or so below the surface of the soil. The trees are small and valueless, except for fuel. They are easily uprooted, and when the clearing is completed, the covering of moss and tundra about a foot in thickness, must be removed and the soil exposed to the summer sun.

There is a popular impression that the railroads projected under this bill will open up considerable areas of valuable timber. But there is no support of fact for this impression. There is no timber in the interior of Alaska, and comparatively little along the coast. Hence there will be no forest products to furnish tonnage for the railroads.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The Forestry Bureau believes it. Mr. SAUNDERS. Where are these forests? I concede that there is a little timber on the coast line, but the railroads in contemplation are to run from the coast into the interior. Get away from the coast, and the timber dwindles into insignificant and worthless growths. While great possibilities have been claimed for mining and agriculture in the interior, these pos-sibilities have not been extended to include timber.

Now Mr. Mann may be mistaken, but at least his report very clearly states that a foot of moss and tundra must be removed to expose the surface soil to the mellowing influences of the summer sun. This is the land that is presented as the future home of millions, happy in the enjoyment of mills and schools, and factories, and well-tilled farms. Whence, I ask, will these people come?

Having in mind that in any State of the Union good farms with improvements thereon, may be purchased at a price per acre far below the sum required to prepare an acre of this Alaskan land for cultivation, pray tell me why anyone should put behind him a country of civilization, of schools, of churches, of abundant opportunity, and leaving the sweet precincts of home, betake himself to the wilderness of the Tanana and the Yukon, to shiver through six months of winter and darkness, and begin life anew under the grim and forbidding conditions of this cheerless land? [Applause.] Mr. W. D. Joyce of the Saturday Blade, accompanied the Seattle excursion through Alaska in 1913, and gives the following description of the land to farmed in that country by homesteaders and settlers: warmth comes from the soil, or beneath the surface. As far down as a shaft has ever been sunk, over 2,000 feet, you find This ice was not made by freezing from the top down. millions of years the country has been built up from the bottom, ice on ice that never thawed out in the summer. The moss that grows everywhere is a complete protection from the sun, and when you sink a pick through it, you think you have struck Clear off this moss, other vegetation, and scrub timber, and you have the frozen earth. The sun will draw out the ice and frost about 1 foot the first year. Break this up, and the next year it thaws out deeper. After a number of years, by next year it thaws out deeper. After a numbe June 1, the frost will disappear down 2 or 3 feet." Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio. Mr. WILLIS. I understood the gentleman to be quoting a few moments ago from the report of Seth Mann.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I did.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman state upon what page he was reading?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Page 12.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman object to reading from pages 13 and 14 what Mr. Mann actually said?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Does the gentleman from Ohio suggest that I have read what he did not say?

Mr. WILLIS. Oh, no; but he says a lot more.

Mr. SAUNDERS. But I am not undertaking to read the entire report

Mr. WILLIS. What the gentleman did read gives an incorrect idea of the conclusions of Seth Mann.

Mr. SAUNDERS. In what way?

Mr. WILLIS. If the gentleman will read pages 13 and 14 he

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have not undertaken to quote this report in full, though I would be more than willing to do so, if time permitted. This document emanates from a friend of this enterprise, but taken as a whole it presents a most discouraging picture of so-called agricultural Alaska.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. Mr. FERRIS. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time, for I am interested in every word that he says. But he made a statement with reference to the ability and power of the people of the United States to purchase land in the United States. I hope that he will add that there are more than 300,000,000 acres of public lands that they can have for the asking and taking it and residing upon it here in the United States.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; my friend is undoubtedly correct and, as I have said, if we will look at this matter in a common-sense way, we will be quick to realize that nowhere in the United States proper is there a section so barren, cheerless, and uninviting that its inhabitants with a knowledge of conditions in Alaska, as depicted by Mr. Mann, would be willing to exchange the meagre opportunities at home, for the chances of agricultural betterment in that far distant land.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has an hour, but he was to be notified when he had used 30 minutes

Mr. DAVENPORT. I want to say to the Chair that there will not be as many gentlemen who desire to speak in opposition to the bill as there are of those who favor the bill, and for that reason a proportionate division of the time would give those in opposition to the bill longer than those in favor of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is trying to equalize the time in that respect.

There are many applications for time, and there are only about four more Members who are to speak against the bill. The Chair is giving them more time than he is assigning to those who are to speak in favor of the bill. Under the rules of the House, the gentleman from Virginia has one hour.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I will proceed a little fur-er. For the benefit of my friend from Ohio, I will read from Mann's report:

The growing of various grains is as yet largely in the experimental stage. But crops of wheat, oats, barley and rye are matured on the Government farms. The summer season is short for the maturing of wheat, but there is much less difficulty with the other grains mentioned. Some hay is cut by individual farmers.

Great possibilities in the matter of hay have been claimed for Alaska, but Mr. Mann dismisses these possibilities with the curt statement: Some hay is cut by individual farmers. To con-

The interior of Alaska is more favorable for agricultural purposes than the regions along the coast.

I now call the attention of my friend particularly to this sentence:

It does not appear that Alaska will ever export the products of agriculture.

Think of the undeveloped areas of the United States proper that we are asked to disregard in favor of a region that will never under the most favorable conditions, export the products of agriculture! Why go to Alaska to expend thirty-five millions, when greater possibilities lie at our door requiring but little expenditure for their development? In this connection, I will reproduce the cautious, not to say discouraging remarks of Dr. Piper of the Agricultural Department who has been conducting some experiments in Alaska: conducting some experiments in Alaska:

conducting some experiments in Alaska:

Prof. PIPER. I may state briefly, in conclusion, that my own viewpoint, and I think that is the viewpoint Prof. Chubbuck has taken—and I am sure it is the one Prof. Georgeson takes in all his reports—is conservative as to the future agricultural development of the interior of Alaska. I have no doubt that with the building of the railways there will be plenty of literature of the boom-type published, but I think it would be something of a calamity to induce any large number of homesteaders to go there to-morrow with the idea that it could be developed rapidly, like much of our prairie country was in the West. In the development of a new agricultural region usually the first development is live stock, and the second is grain raising—usually wheat raising. Now, in the development of the live-stock industry in Alaska somewhat different methods will have to be used to those which farmers have been familiar with in the States, and in a way they will have to feel their way along toward the most profitable methods.

In the matter of extensive grain culture, while that may be possible, I.feel that the farmer himself will have many problems to solve before the ordinary man can be advised to go into farming. That is, in other words, I fear that the greatest danger to the proper development of the interior of Alaska would be of holding out too roseate hopes of what can be done in the way of its agricultural development.

Prof. Chubbuck, another representative of the Agricultural

Prof. Chubbuck, another representative of the Agricultural Department in Alaska, gives an equally gloomy picture of prospective agriculture in that country. I quote from page 27 of Prof. Chubbuck's report:

DIFFICULTIES THAT CONFRONT THE HOMESTEADERS.

Over against the optimistic facts pertaining to this great northwestern portion of the North American Continent, are others that should be remembered by those who contemplate going to Alaska for the purpose of home making, particularly farm home making.

On the south coast, where the climate is mild, tillable land is scarce, because of the proximity of the mountains to the shore line; elsewhere in Alaska the winters are long and very cold, and frost-proof buildings must be provided for the shelter of family and stock.

The ground freezes to a great depth, and there is but a short period during which this can thaw, and the surface is covered with an accumulation of undecayed moss and other vegetable material serving as a protection to the frost, and a reservoir for moisture.

The frost line under natural conditions sinks but a few feet during a season, and the thawed layer is usually a morass of muck in all portions of Alaska where tillage is possible.

Are these mucky morasses, so vividly described by Prof. Chub-

Are these mucky morasses, so vividly described by Prof. Chubbuck, likely to tempt homesteaders and agricultural pioneers from the United States to take up life anew under the discouraging conditions of central Alaska? Bear in mind in connection with this talk about promoting agriculture in this sub-Arctic area that only about 27 per cent of the tillable land of this country, excluding Alaska, is now under cultivation. According to the recent figures put out by the Department of Agriculture, there are $23,000,000 acres of tillable land in the United States which have never been turned by a plow. The "back-to-the-soil" advocates can find land nearer home, under fairer skies, and more attractive surroundings than even the most enthusiastic boomers of this visionary project can claim for this land of tundra, reindeer, and frozen wastes.

I will now reply to some of the arguments of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. RAINEY.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman inform us what the value of agricultural products is that the United States itself is exof agricultural products is that the United States itself is exporting at this time?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, the gentleman is a member of the Ways and Means Committee and ought to be more familiar with the figures than I am. He must know how much wheat for instance we are exporting. The figures are not at hand, but I know that we export a vast amount of agricultural products.

Mr. RAINEY. We did not raise last year enough for home consumption.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Of agricultural products?

Mr. RAINEY. No. and oats from Canada. We are bringing in corn from Argentina

What are the figures of our agricultural Mr. SAUNDERS. exports for last year?

Mr. RAINEY. I do not know how much we exported last ear. We did not produce enough for home consumption.

Mr. SAUNDERS. We may have imported some food products, bananas for instance, but we exported quantities of others. The Department of Commerce gave out the following figures of agricultural exports for the month of December, 1913. It is easy to see from these figures that the aggregate value of our agricultural exports during the past 12 months has been enormous:

December, 1913.
Animals	$541, 204
Breadstuffs	11, 786, 026
Unmanufactured cotton	81, 945, 936
Eggs	286, 212
Fruits and nuts	3, 423, 916
Hay	87, 237
Meat and dairy products	13, 053, 224
Seeds	326, 939
Unmanufactured tobacco	4, 837, 936
Vegetables	390, 927

I believe we are importing some beef, but we are also exporting a great deal. In this connection I wish to say that the reports show that Alaska will never become a stock country. The winters there are too long, and too hard, making the cost of feeding too great, even if the necessary forage could be raised in the summer. With our knowledge of cattle raising in Iceland, and northern Scandinavia, not to speak of Greenland and other countries in the same latitude as interior Alaska, we hazard nothing when we say that the high cost of living will never be reduced by cheap meat from Alaska. In one respect, however, meat from that country would enjoy an advantage over its New Zealand or Argentina competitor—it would not require artificial congelation. The processes of nature would be sufficient. Build these railroads, and the mining and all cognate industries will import their foodstuffs. Business men will always do what it is the cheapest for them to do. They will buy in the cheapest market, and the cheapest market for foodstuffs will always be outside of Alaska.

Mr. Chairman, we are continually reminded that our fore-fathers were mistaken about the possibilities of the great West.

The men of that day knew nothing of the West. To them it was as much terra incognita, as the vast stretches about the South Pole, are to the men of to-day. Hence they were not in a position to make a forecast, or form an intelligent judgment. But we know the facts about Alaska, and the history of countries where conditions are similar. We are not groping in the dark for facts, but are full handed with authentic information, climatic, agricultural, and geographical.

The committee informs us that during six months of the year there is a great deal of sunshine in interior Alaska. We know that, and we also know that for six months there are long nights, and intense cold. Follow the Fairbanks parallel around the world, and at every point on that parallel will be found the same amount of sunshine. There is much sunshine in Greenland, in Arctic Lapland, even at the North Pole, but those countries have never become agricultural countries by reason of that fact. Our friend from Alaska [Mr. Wickersham] speaks with apparent pride of the legions of mosquitoes in Alaska. There are mosquitoes in Greenland, mosquitoes at the North Pole, mosquitoes throughout the Arctic regions, but something more than mosquitoes are needed to attract immigrants into a new country. Some years ago I read a lively account of a trip across Arctic Lapland. We are accustomed to think of that country as a land of frozen, wind-swept wastes, inhabited by wandering Lapps eking out a precarious existence by raising reindeer. The Lapps and the reindeer are there, but in the summer the country is more like Central America, than the conventional idea of the Arctic. The travelers made their way through bogs, and morasses, across lakes, and clear flowing streams, harassed at every step by clouds of ferocious biting insects. And yet, though Arctic Lapland is at the edge of a great population in Europe, it has never attracted immigrants, and has never become an agricultural country. It is as waste, cheerless, and uninhabited to-day as it was 5,000 years ago. Despite the continuous movement of peoples throughout Europe during its entire history, no tide of emigration has ever set toward Lapland. In many respects Lapland corresponds to the descriptions that have been given of Alaska. Indeed reindeer have been imported from Lapland into Alaska on account of the similarity of conditions in the two countries.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] has cited the attitude of certain distinguished men in the early days of the Republic toward the possibilities of what was then the unknown West. Those gentlemen were groping their way. They were not possessed of the facts. Is it a fair conclusion that because our forefathers erred in respect of a matter of which they were confessedly ignorant, therefore every scheme of modern exploitation is to be justified? Does it follow that every scheme with "millions in it," is to be commended by the men of to-day, because men of another generation fell into palpable error, from lack of familiarity with the actual conditions of the territory west of the Mississippi, vaguely supposed to be a land of trackless wastes, and barren mountains, inhabited by fierce tribes of savage Indians?

But if we sin in this matter we will sin with knowledge. We know the actual conditions in Alaska through first-hand information, and if these reports are in anywise challenged, then the voice of wisdom suggests delay until the facts can be ascertained in the most definite and authoritative fashion. said that Alaska is a treasure house, a land of unbounded pos-Are there no treasure houses, no possibilities nearer home? We are told that we owe a duty to the 15,000 sojourners in the inhospitable interior of that country. Do we owe no duty to the people at home whose money will be expended with lavish hand to build these trial railroads, with which to feel out this land, and ascertain what of value is contained within its forbidding portals?

Upon what does the committee seek to rest this report? Upon the last Democratic platform? There is not a line in that platform that justifies the scheme submitted in this bill. The Baltimore platform declares that we should open up the coal lands of Alaska under such conditions as will keep them out of the hands of monopolizing corporations. This can be done with an expenditure of a four little and the conditions of t expenditure of a few millions. I would gladly support a common-sense proposition for building a line, or lines into these coal fields. This done, and the roads opened, we could try out the value of the coal and the cost of mining and transportation to the coast. Incidentally prospectors could ascertain the presence and possibilities of other minerals. and possibilities of other minerals. If on trial it is found that Alaskan coal can be mined and sold on the Pacific coast at a cost to meet free coal from British Columbia, then the mines may be worked to their utmost capacity. But thirty-five millions will not be needed to finance such an experiment. moderate appropriation will suffice for a very thorough inquiry into the value of the Alaskan coal fields.

Mr. DIES. This bill has grown to $40,000,000 since the last time we had it under consideration.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken about

Mr. DIES. But the Rules Committee brought in a rule providing that we should consider the Senate bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Well, if that be true, we ought to hurry If debate lasts much longer the bill will doubtless carry fifty millions. Perhaps it would be economy to pass the Senate bill to-day, lest by another Calendar Wednesday this measure may carry an even more staggering amount than fifty millions.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Oh, both gentlemen are incorrect in their statements.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. Mr. DAVENPORT. If we are not operating under the rule that was adopted that made it in order that general debate proceed to-day on Senate bill 48, in lieu of the House bill, then the mr. SAUNDERS. Of course we are operating under the rule.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Of course we are operating under the rule.

Mr. DAVENPORT. The trouble about that is—

Mr. SAUNDERS. I can bring this matter to a head in a moment, by a simple question addressed to the gentleman from

Mr. DAVENPORT. If the chairman will permit me, it may have been intended, as suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Garrett], that this morning under that rule the chairman of the committee would suggest that that rule be construed to say that it was a substitute for an amended bill reported back, but the rule does not so state.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Does the Senate bill carry $40,000,000 or not?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. It does.
Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman allow me to state what the proposition is? It is to take up the Senate bill and consider that in lieu of the House bill. The Senate bill was referred to the Committee on the Territories, and that committee has reported it back to the House and recommended its passage after striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting the House bill, which carries $35,000,000 only.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Even our House committee could not stomach the Senate bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. On the point that is engaging the attention of the committee I find, on page 15 of the Senate bill, the following:

Provided, however, That the total amount authorized by this act to be appropriated shall not exceed the sum of $35,000,000, including any sum in or by this act appropriated.

It is the Senate bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. How could the House bill strike out five millions from the Senate bill, and leave a residue of thirty millions, unless the bill carried forty millions? From what is the gentleman from Wisconsin reading?

Mr. HOUSTON. That is the Senate bill as reported back by the House Committee on the Territories?

Mr. DAVENPORT. The Senate bill carried $40,000,000 as it came to the House.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] to say that it did not carry $40,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I read the bill as it passed the Senate. Mr. SAUNDERS. This is an illustration of the confusion that prevails as to every stage and every feature of this Alaskan proposition.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Who is mistaken, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford], or the gentleman from Virginia? I said the Senate bill carried $40,000,000 as it came to the House. Now, who is mistaken?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The gentleman is wrong.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Who is wrong?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. You are. Mr. HOUSTON. The Senate bill originally carried $40,000,000.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That is all that I have said.

Mr. HOUSTON. It was sent to the House and referred to the Committee on the Territories, and reported back here carrying only $35,000,000.

Mr. SAUNDERS. When I made the statement that the Senate bill carried $40,000,000, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] rose to correct me, and read from printed matter before him, which he said showed that I was in error as to this statement. Who was right, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Stafford] or the gentleman from Virginia? I said that the Senate bill carried $40,000,000, and the gentleman from Tennessee said that his committee reduced it by $5,000,000.

Mr. HARDY. The whole error grew out of the statement of another gentleman, that you are now considering the Senate bill of $45,000,000.

to a strain a str

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion, which is that he go on with his argument and let that quibble alone?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I will proceed, then, to refer to some other statements contained in the report, and in the arguments advanced by the friends of this measure. My friend from Ohio, Mr. Brumbaugh, in his speech of a day or two ago, undertook to establish the possibilities of agricultural development in Alaska, by the analogy of conditions in countries presumably similarly situated. He cited Denmark in that connection. I wish to say that Denmark is many a long mile south of the garden spot of Alaska. The sixtieth parallel of latitude runs above the peninsula of Denmark, and a long way south of the Tanana and Yukon Valleys. The descriptions of so-called agri-cultural Alaska continually remind the reader of northern Siberia. While Alaska is often compared with Siberia, the com-parison only holds good with the northern portion of that immense country. A recent writer on Siberia describes it as naturally falling into three zones, running east-west.

First there is the northern zone, which is in the same latitude as Fairbanks, and is a region of eternally frozen soil, a mere veneer of which thaws enough to allow a growth of moss and lichen, in the summer. Below this zone is a belt of poplar, larch, willow, and other tree growths. Still further south, is the black-soil belt, the seat of Siberian agricultural wealth, and the home of the bulk of the population. This zone comprises the mid valleys of the great rivers, but is only one-fourteenth of the entirety of Siberia.

The third zone is hundreds of miles south of Fairbanks. Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.
Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is it not true that Greenland and Labrador present no parallel to this, because the Arctic current, carrying cold water and yielding off cold air, passes Greenland and Labrador, whereas this is influenced by a warm current from Japan?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I ask my friend whether there are any countries in the world, civilized, or uncivilized where agriculture is being successfully, much less extensively, conducted in a soil that is frozen to an unknown depth, to bedrock wherever it is found. Yet this is what is proposed to be done in the Tanana Valley. The cold facts about this region, and cold is the appropriate adjective, are that "the country is a frozen wilderness for the greater part of the year, a fly-plagued sweat bath for the balance of the time, and is otherwise just as it came from the hands of the Creator.'

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think that is a clear evasion of my question, but the question can be answered.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, the question is easy to answer, and my question in a measure answers it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I would like to have it answered. Mr. SAUNDERS. The fact that this soil in Alaska is frozen to an unknown depth, shows that agriculture on any large scale will be as impossible in that country, as in Labrador, or Greenland, whatever may be the conditions in the latter countries.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman permit me to answer that in his time?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No. Has not the gentleman time? Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Not nearly as much as you have. Mr. SAUNDERS. I will have to proceed. It will be your task, in your time, to satisfy your colleagues who represent great States, with far-flung fields under a genial sun, States where there is social life and comforts, and opportunity, and where rich farms with complete improvements may be bought for $100 an acre, and in many cases for a less amount, that such are the possibilities of agriculture in Alaska that the men and the women of these States will turn their faces toward the aurora borealis, and under its flickering lights painfully cut down trees, grub out roots, and remove moss and tundra until at last the sun may shine upon the thin and sour soil from which thenceforward they will wring a reluctant livelihood. It is agreed that this initial expense will run from $125 to $200 an acre. At this rate the cost of preparing a farm of 300 acres for the plow, will run from $37,500, to $60,000. Great are the possibilities, likewise the disappointments that await the agricultural pioneer in Alaska!

Why the majority report quotes approvingly the statement of one gentleman to the effect that if we pass this bill, and open up Alaska there will be eventually four or five hundred million people in that country in 10 or 15 years. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Five hundred what?
Mr. SAUNDERS. Five hundred thousand, I meant to say. I am so used to dealing with the figures of the Alaskan boomers that I become a little confused at times. [Laughter.]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; but one is as good as the other.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes, that is true. It is just as likely that 500,000,000 people will be in Alaska in 10 years, as 500,000, under the new conditions is to be self-sustaining. But the gentle-

Either statement is equally wide of the mark. Let me read you this, from Mr. Joslin, one of the Alaskan boomers. He says:

this, from Mr. Joslin, one of the Alaskan boomers. He says:

I think it is not unreasonable to say that if this approximately 1,000 miles of railroad was built and put in operation and the country opened up so that it could be used, its entire trade would go to at least five times its present extent, and its annual production would be five times what it is to-day. If the Territory were opened up its population, if it were to grow to five times the present population, would be about 175,000. That is scarcely a handful. There is no doubt in the world that 400,000 or 500,000 people could be readily attracted to Alaska in the next 10 or 15 years, and that its annual trade, which is now about $60,000,000, would go to $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 per year. Its gold output, which is now about $17,000,000, would increase to three or four times its present value. I believe that increase is entirely possible. Not only that, but I believe that within 10 or 15 years, assuming that the country is to be properly developed with railroads, the gold output of Alaska would equal $100,000,000 a year.

Now what would constitute this $400,000,000 a year in the way.

Now what would constitute this $400,000,000 a year in the way of trade? What form would it take? Of course we know that a great value of furs has come from Alaska since we bought it. But these furs would not afford any tonnage to the railroads that will be built under this bill. A few box cars will hold all the furs that will ever come out of interior Alaska. We know too that the value of the fish annually caught in Alaskan waters is very great. But these fish are caught on the coast. They will not be transported by the railroads, but will come to the States by steamships. Last year, I believe, $18,000,000 of gold came from Alaska. I do not know how much of this came from Nome, or Treadwell, but concede that all of it came from Fairbanks, and how much tonnage would it afford for the new railroad? About 12,000 pounds. The supplies needed for the men who wash this gold would be a negligible item for a great railroad. Of course it is argued that quartz mines may be opened, and placers worked on a much larger scale. All of this may be true, and doubtless to some extent will be true, but the evidence on this point is unsatisfactory.

The line from Chitina to Fairbanks will be 313 miles. It will certainly cost not less than $48,000 a mile. Some of the Alaskan roads have cost $100,000 a mile. From Chitina to Fairbanks the road will pass through a country that will afford no tonnage, a dreary, barren, unattractive waste. The initial cost of construction under such conditions, will be immense. Is there anyone with knowledge of the facts who fancies that the tonnage of machinery and supplies on this road, and the passenger fares, will ever render it self-sustaining, much less make it a dividend? If in the result it will not be self-sustaining, how long is it proposed for this road to be operated by the Government at a loss?

Dr. Brooks makes some interesting statements bearing on this Chitina-Fairbanks route. In part he says:

When we leave Chitina along this proposed route into Fairbanks, we traverse a broad upland, a gravel filled area where the rock has been buried to a depth of 300, and possibly 1,000 feet. Here there is no possibility of any mineral resources being developed. There may be some lightic coal, under a part of this gravel, but not worthy of consideration. To the east, the gold and copper prospects seem promising, though there have been no extensive developments. To the northwest are some auriferous lodes, which might be of value, if they had transportation. These deposits are not on the main line to Fairbanks, but could be reached by a branch line.

In this connection Dr. Brooks suggested various possible branch lines or feeders.

But when you get to the mountains you strike a region somewhat mineralized, and not far from the route is the Slate Creek district, where some gold placers are found. These are about 30 miles from the main line. There is also the Valdez Creek placer district, perhaps 100 miles to the west. There are also some indications of mineralization along the main line, as soon as you reach the mountains, so that there is at least promise of some mineral development.

This is a very conservative statement of Dr. Brooks, and is in striking contrast with the glowing representations of the spokesmen for the Seattle boomers. Indications of mineralization, and a promise of some mineral development, afford but little ground of support for expensive railway projects. In this matter, we ought to have some regard at least for returns, and the considerations that are usually potent with prudent business men. The credit of the United States will not be strained to the breaking point, should it spend $35,000,000, or even $135,000,000 in railway construction in Alaska. We are rich enough to commit almost any folly. But why select Alaska as a field in which extravagance shall run riot? There are many States in the West that hold out a promise of "some mineral development," and are entitled to greater consideration than Alaska, if this House is anxious to make a record for chasing rainbows.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes

Mr. LAFFERTY. What does the gentleman suppose the tonnage of provisions would amount to, going into the miners' camps, mining this $18,000,000 of gold?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Not very great. According to the friends of the bill, the farmers of Alaska will feed the miners. Alaska man seems to think that the miners will be fed from the outside, and by implication he discredits the agricultural possibilities of the garden spot. In that I think that he is right. But should the United States build an expensive railroad into Alaska, in order to give miners a chance to prespect for hidden wealth? Is the Cov give miners a chance to prospect for hidden wealth? Is the Government going into the prospecting business? If the proposition is at last reduced to this basis, it would be well to equip a number of expeditions, and at a cost of half a million, if necessary, secure some authentic figures as to the gold deposits, the extent of their probable development, the number of people that they would be likely to attract, and upon the most favorable estimate, the amount of tonnage that these operations, and the industries incidental thereto, and in connection therewith, would afford to the Fairbanks Railroad. These figures, and some further figures as to the probable cost of constructing and operating the road, would give us a working basis. As it is we are making a leap in the dark. Look at this matter in a homely, common-sense way. The time is coming when we must report to our constituents, and give an account of our stewardship. They will ask us what we have done for the general uplift, for domestic development, for roads, and canals, and rural routes, and levees, and reclamation projects, and when we recite the long list of measures of popular interest that failed of passage, measures of domestic interest that have been awaited with eager expectancy, will we be able to justify ourselves by saying, Oh yes, we omitted to do these things, but as an offset, we appropriated $35,000,000 for the development of Alaska. Will our constituents be satisfied when we tell them that the imperious demands o Alaska absorbed the funds that otherwise might have been expended on domestic enterprises of transcendent interest?

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.
Mr. BOOHER. What domestic enterprises does the gentleman refer to

Mr. SAUNDERS. Well, for one, I think the development of good roads at home is of far greater importance to the people of this country than the building of railroads in Alaska.

Mr. BOOHER. Then the gentleman's idea is that it is a good idea to build railroads here, in order to uplift the people rather than let them help themselves?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. I think we ought to build roads for Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. I think we ought to build roads for our 90,000,000 people at home, rather than construct railroads for 15,000, or 20,000 people in interior Alaska. The rest of the 35,000 people of that Territory are on the coast, and will not be affected by these projected railroads.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Could not the gentleman find another avenue for the use of public funds in the drainage of swamp lands?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; I could suggest many other and more hopeful projects for the expenditure of public funds.

Mr. SLAYDEN. You could recover the swamp lands in Virginia, for instance?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; the Dismal Swamp if drained at an expenditure of a few millions, would afford homes for, and support more people, than will be found in Alaska in 100 years. Apply this thirty-five millions to relieve the rich lands of the lower Mississippi from overflow and you will open up to permanent settlement and cultivation, an area of inexhaustible fertility, equal to the aggregate of several present populous States of the Union. Such a work will contribute more to the sum total of human output, happiness, and national prosperity in the United States, than the utmost achievements in Alaska during a thousand years to come. [Applause.] The outcome of these domestic improvements will be positively beneficial, and capable of definite forecast. The other scheme is a chimerical quest of prosperity under positively adverse and impossible conditions.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes. Mr. LAFFERTY. Is it not a fact that we have expended over $100,000,000 on the Mississippi River?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Possibly, though I do not know the figures. That expenditure has been fully justified. Continued expenditures in that direction may be expected, as well as for rivers generally, harbors, and roads.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The gentleman mentioned the coal as not being fit for the Navy. Would the gentleman withhold the development of the Alaska coal fields simply because the coal was not fit for one particular purpose?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman. I have already stated that I would gladly vote a reasonable amount for the development of the Alaskan coal fields. Such an appropriation would be in conformity with our Democratic platform, adopted at Baltimore.

A. FFERTY. We need the coal in Oregon, for instance,

Mr. SAUNDERS. Should we build a railroad into the Bering River region, and one into the Matanuska coal field, we could try out the value of that coal, and determine the cost of mining, and the cost of transportation, in a word ascertain what of value is there, and whether this coal could compete on the Pacific coast with free coal from British Columbia. This would be the common-sense way to deal with this proposition, and I would vote for it.

Does not this bill leave it to the discretion Mr. LAFFERTY.

of the President to build one railroad or two?

Mr. SAUNDERS. No. This bill provides for an ambitious scheme of railroads, and for prospective agricultural development, in the garden spot of Alaska.

Mr. LAFFERTY. But the discretion is left with the Presi-

Mr. SAUNDERS. In a measure it is left with him, but by passing this bill in its present form, we do not confine ourselves, as outlined in the Democratic platform, to opening up the coal fields. We commit ourselves to a much more comprehensive project, and indorse the report of the committee that there is a great field for agricultural development in that country. maintain that we owe a greater duty-because it is a more obvious, and a more easily ascertainable duty, in its terms and extent-to our people at home.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Does not that agricultural development mean the incidental encouragement of agriculture?

SAUNDERS. Surely my friends on the committee are not willing for you to tone down their glowing report by the suggestion that the prosecution of agriculture in Alaska will be a mere side issue, so to say, to the development of Alaska? Will the development of the garden spot of Alaska be an incidental feature of this wonderful enterprise? Oh, assuredly not.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman has just referred to the opening of the coal lands. Does the gentleman think that if the coal lands of Alaska were opened, according to the plans to which he has referred, there would be a sufficient inducement in that to secure the construction of a railroad by private parties?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Where to?

Mr. WILLIS. Of course I mean the roads that would tap the coal fields.

Mr. SAUNDERS. We are to build those roads.

Mr. WILLIS. What I am asking the gentleman is this: Without any governmental action save and except the opening of the coal fields, does the gentleman think that would be a sufficient incentive to private capital to build these roads, without any action on the part of the Government?

Mr. SAUNDERS. If there is nothing in Alaska worth going after, of course private capital will not be attracted, but the construction of railroads into the coal fields will be the means of ascertaining what is there, and its value. That is what I wish to see done. Children first crawl, then walk. Let us crawl first on this proposition, and by spending three, or four, or five million dollars, afford the means of developing the coal areas. As an incident to this development, we will be able to ascertain what else of value may be found in Alaska.

Mr. WILLIS. The gentleman did not quite apprehend the point I have been trying to make. It has been said a number of times in this debate—perhaps by the gentleman; I am not sure—that if we merely open up Alaska private capital will go in there and build these roads.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Well that may be so. Build railroads to the coal fields, afford liberal leasing laws, and land laws, and wait on development by private capital. There is no need of reckless haste about this matter-Alaska will keep.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman believe that if there is any great mineral wealth in the Alaskan coal fields, of a kind which would offer a remunerative return to a railway corporation, if the Government opened it up, capital would go there?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Of course if there is anything of value in Alaska, and that value is once reasonably ascertained, and laws are enacted that will admit of adequate development-and such laws should be passed—private enterprise will develop Alaska as rapidly as it is necessary that it should be developed.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is what the gentleman from Ohio

wanted to know.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I object to the pursuit of the speculative, the problematical, and the possible, in preference to the definite projects of sober domestic development that are clamorously calling for our attention.

The report of the committee is very insistent that apart from other considerations, Alaskan coal must be developed for naval purposes. Of course the military element must be injected into this enterprise. Whenever arguments are lacking for an extravagant expenditure, there is always a final appeal to be made in its behalf, that it is necessary as a vital feature of a proper condi-tion of military preparedness. Unfortunately for the committee their argument in this respect has been completely refuted by the results of the naval tests. But even if this coal was suitable for naval use, why develop it at a prodigious expense for an oil-burning Navy? The Secretary of the Navy recently made the following official announcement:

The Government has definitely abandoned the use of coal in future fighting ship designs, and all destroyers, submarines and battleships are being designed for oil burners.

Plans for Government oil wells, and refineries to insure an adequate supply of fuel oil for the Navy, are rapidly taking shape. The special commission announced yesterday that hearings would begin to-day at the department. Later they will visit the Oklahoma oil centers, and make personal examinations of the fields.

So that long ere coal will be available from Alaska, the opportunity for its naval use will have disappeared. In this view, the ridiculous figures of a former Secretary of Navy that Alaska should be opened up, because our fleet in the Pacific, might need 200,000 tons of coal a month for a war lasting 12 months, become, if possible, even more ridiculous. Another objection to this Alaskan project, if it is put on military grounds, is that it will later call for a great expenditure for troops, guns, and fortifications, duplicating our Panama experience in that respect. No estimate whatever was made in the initial estimates of the cost of the Panama Canal for fortifications and garrisons, at the terminals. The country was informed that its construction would be an economy, since it would tend to reduce the size of the Navy, by making the fleet more effective, and providing for an expeditious transfer from one ocean to another. As soon as the project was well under way, the country was advised that additional ships would be needed to protect the canal. To the same end, a demand was made for elaborate fortifications, great guns, and permanent garrisons at the Atlantic and Pacific terminals. It is perfectly obvious that if we are to have great coal depots in Alaska to supply our ships in the event of that war with Japan which looms with such portentous proportions in the mind's eye, of our jingo friends, we must protect these depots against attack. Otherwise we will provide a source of supply for our hypothetical enemy.

Already in Alaska we have wasted $800,000 or $1,000,000 on a perfectly useless fort. The friends of this measure need not think that $35,000,000 will be the limit of expenditure under this bill. The demand for fortifications, garrisons, and guns will include many additional millions.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Has the gentleman read the report of that commission that went up on the Maryland?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have read the reports that have been submitted. They are authentic and convincing.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I mean, in the preparation for this presentation to the House, did the gentleman read the report of that

Mr. SAUNDERS. I have not seen that particular report. prefer to read the results of actual tests, and attach more value to them than to the speculations of wandering commissions

Mr. LAFFERTY. Is the gentleman aware that the oil fields of Alaska are more valuable for naval purposes than the California fields?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am not aware of it. Such a suggestion is not made in the report. Two of the pillars on which this project is supposed to rest, to wit; naval coal, and agriculture, having been overthrown. Is the gentleman seeking to erect another?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Does the gentleman know that the Alaska oil is better than the California oil for naval purposes?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do not admit that there is any commercial oil in Alaska, but I would be willing to equip an expedition at considerable expense to try out the possibilities of oil fields in that country. No subject has been more thoroughly exploited, or caused more acute disappointments, than alleged oil fields.
Mr. LAFFERTY. They reported on the oil.
Mr. SLAYDEN. They do not transport oil by rail, anyhow.
Mr. SAUNDERS. No, the efficient modern method is by Mr. SAUNDERS. No, the efficient modern method is by pipes, but I am afraid that this method might not be practicable in Alaska. The pipes might be frozen at the very time that war was raging, the Japs at our door, and the oil most needed.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

That oil is in a warm country.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Does it never freeze there?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. No. Mr. SAUNDERS. This is a warm country, but we have freezing weather, all the same.

Mr. LAFFERTY. You could not freeze up that oil.
Mr. SAUNDERS. Why not, oil freezes at a low temperature.
But as showing that the Navy is not looking to Alaska for oil, permit me to call your attention to the fact that at this very time, the Secretary of the Navy is making arrangements to This is said to be a new policy, calling for large expenditures. secure a sufficient supply of oil in Oklahoma, and pipe the same I am not afraid of a new policy. I am not afraid to expend to tidewater, in order to provide fuel for the future oil-burning shins

Mr. WICKERSHAM. That might explain the objections of Mr. DAVENPORT. The gentleman from Oklahoma lays aside his personal and past record when he is advocating a matter of principle.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I do not challenge the authority of the Government to build and operate these roads, nor do I anticipate any engineering difficulties, that will not be readily overcome. I have full confidence in the ability and resourcefulness of American engineers, and an even greater confidence in the length of Uncle Sam's purse. Indeed there are no engineering problems relating to railroad construction in Alaska. With the Government footing the bills, mountains may be moved, rivers bridged or tunneled, glaciers deflected, nature in her wildest forms subdued, but a successful engineering proposition, is not of necessity a successful commercial proposition. If we are trustees of the public purse, we must give an account of our stewardship. The figures cited in support of this project are misleading. Neither the fish nor the furs of Alaska will afford tonnage for the railroads. Much of the gold comes from Nome and Treadwell, which are at the water's edge. A comparatively small expediture will develop the coal, and private capital, under reasonable leasing laws will work the mines to the utmost limit of profitable operation. If they prove to be unprofitable as a commercial proposition, the Government should not undertake to operate them at a loss. The agricultural possibilities of this country are too remote to be taken into serious consideration, as a foundation for this enterprise. These possibilities are stated so cautiously, and with so much reservation by the Government agents who have conducted experiments in that region, that the statements of these agents are really warning signals, and should serve to discourage rather than encourage emigration to Alaska. Whatever may be the hopes that this country holds out to adventurous prospectors who are ready to take a gambler's chance, it affords no attractions to the agricultural pioneer. In time perchance, far down the centuries, the inexorable law of increase may fill to overflowing the countries that are blessed with a could support the countries that are blessed with a could support the countries that are blessed with a could support the countries that are blessed with a could support the countries that are blessed with a could support that are blessed with a could support the countries that are blessed with a could support the countries that are blessed with a could support the countries that are blessed with a could support the countries that are blessed with a could support the countries that are blessed with a countries that are blessed w threes, the meantaine law of increase may into overnowing the countries that are blessed with a genial sun, and a generous soil. This will be Alaska's opportunity.

When the door of agricultural opportunity is closed else-where, reluctant pilgrims may take up the trail that leads to the frozen North. For the present, these doors are wide open. I do not question that there are brave and hardy men in Alaska. The conditions require men of that type, and to the extent of our duty, I am ready to aid them. But I submit that the expenditure proposed is in excess of that duty, and the results promised are speculative and problematical in their character. There are other obligations nearer home, where the population is greater, and the prospect of return from Government enterprises, more assured. The expenditure of this vast sum for the handful of people in interior Alaska, when a like expenditure in the United States will effect a far greater good, for a far greater number, will be a crime against humanity. This is a case of number, will be a crime against humanity. This is a case of grotesque disproportion between cause and effect, between the amount to be expended, and the result that will be secured. When the mountain labors, and the product of parturition is a ridiculous mouse, it is an occasion for laughter. A lavish expenditure of millions to secure the pitiful returns likely to be afforded by the railroads in contemplation, will serve to discredit any political party that is associated with the enterprise. This enterprise calls for a thorough and painstaking inquiry, before we commit ourselves irrevocably to its prosecution. There is no occasion for haste. If Alaska is a treasure house, we may be assured that our treasure is secure. Thieves will not break through and steal. We hold the key, to be used in our own good time. The full development of Alaska will require 10,000 miles of railroad.

If limited to a cost of $48,000 a mile, this would make an aggregate of $480,000,000. I am unwilling to commit myself even partially to so gigantic a proposition. I am unwilling to go further than the requirements of our Baltimore platform, which merely requires us to open up the coal lands, so that they will not fall into the hands of monopolizing corporations. Even this plank does not commit us to the construction of railroads. The end sought may be effected by private capital under a reasonable leasing system. We are going headlong into a venture that holds out dazzling possibilities of unlimited expenditure by the Government. The same arguments that suffice to justify the present scheme, will be equally potent to induce further con-struction on a larger scale. If the United States owes a duty to the Tanana, and the Kuskokwim, the same obligations of duty will apply to other and more remote sections of that country.

money. The public interests often require that money shall be expended. But the policy must be sound, and the expenditure judicious, to secure my support.

With the passage of this bill, I see the finish of many far more meritorious projects of domestic interest, projects to which we are committed by every consideration of duty, interest,

Mr. Chairman, this proposition is fundamentally and radically unsound. It is not justified by our Democratic platform. It is not justified by the figures and arguments submitted in its behalf. Holding out no hopeful prospect of definite returns, within any time to which as practical legislators we should limit our contemplation, this measure is not entitled to our support. For one, I shall vote against it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think it is very fortunate that this great question comes before Congress unaffected by any shade of partisan feeling, and that it has been discussed entirely on its merits. It is in no sense partisan. President Taft favored the policy of the bill when he was in the White House, and so did Secretary of the Interior Fisher. President Wilson has strongly recommended it, and no clearer or more forceful words have been spoken in favor of it than by the present able and clear-seeing head of the Interior De-While there seems to have been partment, Secretary Lane. entire unanimity in executive circles as to the proper course to pursue, there is a difference of opinion in the Congress, and advocates and opponents are found on both sides of the main aisle at both ends of the Capitol. The friends of the measure have nothing to fear from the fullest and freest discussion of it, for it is a wise, patriotic, and truly progressive

The differences of opinion in the House as shown by the discussion of the bill are very sharp. In the heat of debate there may have been some unconscious exaggeration on both sides. The climate and agricultural prospects of the Territory have been made the subject of mirth and ridicule and sarcasm by gentlemen opposed to the measure, and they have frequently relieved the tedium of the debate by brilliant sallies of wit at the expense of Alaska; but while wit often amuses it rarely convinces, and the friends of the bill are so conscious of the strength and justice of their cause that they are quite ready to enjoy these jokes of the opposition, well knowing that the good sense of the House will decide the question on its merits, not for to-day or to-morrow alone, but for the future.

Gentlemen opposing the bill, and notably my clever and genial friend from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], took advantage of some highly colored statements for the purpose of his argument, erected a man of straw, and then proceeded to demolish him. I think that the truth lies between the extremes in this case,

I think that the truth hes between the extremes in this case, as in most other cases. But in my opinion no one, however bitterly opposed to the bill, will deny that Alaska has tremendous, or, as one report puts it, prodigious possibilities.

If some of the opponents of the bill are correct, Alaska is a continuous frost—a sort of false pretense, a gold brick that Russia cunningly worked off on us—and that money spent in building railroads there would be virtually wasted. They say the white population there has not increased appreciably in a the white population there has not increased appreciably in a decade; hence, what use to build railroads? They urge that enterprises conducted by the Government cost more than private enterprises; therefore the bill should not pass.

They say we should wait till the sturdy pioneers go there with their mule teams and ox teams and convert Alaska into a state of happy homes, and they predict that if the Government builds railroads there it will have to also go into the logging and coal-mining and gold-mining business.

I do not contend that the Valley of the Tanana rivals the Misa do not contend that the valley of the Nile in fertility. It is not at all necessary that it should in order to justify the vote I expect to cast for this bill. I do not claim that agriculture will follow the building of railroads in Alaska as it did in Illinois and many other States of the Union, nor do I think that Chicago will be duplicated on the Yukon or on the Tanana. It is not necessary that any of these things should happen to justify the passage of this bill. But I do contend that Alaska is a very wonderful country, full of tremendous possibilities, possessed of very great mineral wealth, and that it has agricultural land enough to furnish food for a population of many millions of people; and I see no reason why, in the course of time, the Territory would not have a population of at least 10,000,000 of brave, hardy, intelligent, freedom-loving American citizens. I do not expect that to happen right away, but I do think that in legislating for Alaska at this time we have a right to look forward to a time when it will be as populous and as prosperous as the corresponding territory in northern Europe, and that it is right and wise to make laws for it on that theory.

I do not expect that population to be wholly, or even mainly, agricultural. I do not expect many of the pioneers there to be farmers; indeed, I think agriculture will follow rather than lead; that it will be mainly incidental to the development of that country's wonderful mineral resources.

I doubt very much if many people would go to Alaska to farm for a living if that were the only attraction, but gold and silver and copper and coal and other minerals abound there; men will go there to develop this mineral wealth, and some will in due course take to agriculture to raise food products for the others.

Thus agriculture will follow mining and other industries until most of Alaska's 64,000,000 acres of agricultural land is brought into use. In the development of the Territory the mineral wealth will be the primary attraction; the development of the mineral wealth will take precedence, but the development of agriculture will follow closely on its trail.

That raises the question, What are the mineral possibilities in Alaska? I am not going to speak of the oil, although it is there. It may not cut much of a figure in railroad transporta-I will not speak of tin, because we do not know how much exists there, and it is a very scarce and valuable mineral. But as to the three leading ones-gold, copper, and coal-I say, and it seems to me too clear to be denied, that these are of tremendous, of prodigious value, and the development of them requires absolutely the building of some railroads, not so much for the gold, because gold, especially that obtained by placer mining, is of comparatively small bulk and may be carried on the person or by inferior means of transportation.

Mr. HARDY. How about the machinery to develop the gold? Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I was coming to that. Many of the placer mines in the Fairbanks region are being practically abandoned, scarcely half worked out, because of the lack of machinery. Quartz mining also exists there.

But much of this mineral wealth, indeed most of it, is far inland, behind high and almost impassable mountain ranges, and little progress can be made in developing it without the means of transportation; that is, without railroads. A great storehouse of wealth lies back in the interior beyond the coastal mountain range, and, as the President has well said, railroads are the key to it. There is, and there can be, no other key to develop the mineral wealth lying in this great storehouse. Railroads are absolutely and indispensably necessary for that purpose. All agree about that.

But who will furnish the key? Who will build these railroads?

If they are built at all, they must be built either by some very rich and powerful syndicate, able to invest many millions of dollars and wait a long time for returns on the investment, or they must be built by the United States Government. Which is the safer and better course to take? [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. Can the gentleman conceive of any way that the Guggenheims or the Alaska Syndicate or anybody else could derive any monopoly from the leasing system?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If they can not get a monopoly there they will not build the railroads.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me answer that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I can not allow the gentleman to answer that in my time. The gentleman would not ask that on second thought, would he?
Mr. FERRIS. I would not. Go ahead. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No combination of rich men, no syndicate, will undertake the work of building railroads in Alaska under all the circumstances, unless it has an assurance amounting to a guaranty that it will control the great natural wealth of the Territory. No concern would undertake so enormous an expenditure on any other condition, for the development of the Territory will, under the most favorable circumstances, be rather slow. If such a course is pursued, if we turn the wealth of the Territory over to exploiting syndicates, Alaska will inevitably fall into a far worse than medieval feudalism.

To permit the development of Alaska along monopolistic lines means an abandonment of our present national policy with reference to conservation. It would mean an abandonment of the theory that the mineral wealth in public lands shall remain the property of the American people, and adoption of the theory that such mineral wealth shall be turned over to the private syndicates and that they will then build railroads to that wealth. For I think it entirely safe to assume that no set of men with money enough or credit enough to build even the necessary trunk lines in Alaska would use their money or their credit for such a purpose without an assurance that they could control the mineral wealth of the Territory. The railroads now in existence there probably would not have been built if those who built them did not believe that they would get virtual control of the mineral opportunities which these roads tapped. The Alaska Syndicate built its road from Cordova to the copper mines on this theory. Later, the syndicate surveyed and arranged to build a spur road from a point on this line to the Bering coal field, and this was doubtless done on the theory that they field, and this was doubtless done on the theory that they would obtain title in fee to the Cunningham coal claims and several other groups of claims constituting the cream of the Bering coal field. Under a change of administrative policy, these coal claims slipped from their grasp, and then the syndicate promptly abandoned the building of the spur road.

In this they acted wisely, for while it would doubtless be good business to build the spur if they owned the coal field, it would be a different proposition to build it when the Government carried the coal real week the right to mint it.

owned the coal and merely leased the right to mine it.

Assuming, then, that if Alaska is to be developed at all it must have railroads, and assuming that private capital will not build them unless it is given a free hand in the exploitation of the Territory's mineral wealth, we are confronted by two alternatives-either the Government must build them, or we must abandon our present policy as to the conservation of our natural resources and hand all these vast opportunities over to private monopolies that will build them. There is no middle ground, and whether they so intend or not those who oppose the bill inevitably place themselves in opposition to the policy of true conservation.

In my opinion the American people want to give Alaska a chance, and they will not consent to abandon the policy of conservation, nor will they consent to turn over to any syndicate or to any monopoly the great stores of mineral wealth it contains.

POPULATION DECREASING.

It is contended by those opposing the bill that the population of Alaska is not increasing; that there are only 35,000 white people there; that there were as many or more people there three years ago; therefore we should not build these railroads.

It seems to me there is a lack of frankness and fairness in this objection when urged by persons familiar with the absurd laws now in force in Alaska. Under these laws the coal mines are sealed, homesteading is made practically impossible, cutting timber is a crime, and railroads struggling to live under impossible laws are taxed $100 a mile and denied the use of

Up to 1911 there was a prospect that the coal mines would e worked. But it developed that most of the coal entries be worked. were fraudulent, having been made with a view to consolidation into one huge monopolistic interest when the entrymen got title, and as a consequence nearly all of them have been canceled. The cancellation of the coal entries killed all hope of opening coal mines, and that in turn killed the railroad business and general development. Three thousand men left the Territory in 1911 and 1912 on that account alone. In addition to this many of the accessible streams which gave opportunity for placer mining are becoming exhausted, so far as the mining methods now in vogue are concerned, Better machinery would make it profitable to work them over, but without railroads that machinery can not be had.

Valuable gold prospects in various places can not be developed for a similar reason.

Mr. FERRIS. Does not the gentleman think a lease law would remedy all of the ills of which he complains?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I think a leasing law is necessary, but I think one step in the right direction is not enough. We must have leasing laws that are liberal, but before we can avail ourselves of them we must get the key, as the President said, which will open up these very valuable mineral assets.

The great cost of making surveys and the great expense of necessary traveling back and forth to Juneau prevent homesteading; and so it goes through the whole ridiculous round. Indeed, it seems as if the Territorial laws could not be made more effectual if the purpose was to prevent the development of the country. The laws in force are well calculated to drive out those who are there and offer no inducement to others to take their places. Is it candid under these well-known conditions to charge the diminishing population to a lack of natural advantages in the country? Is it frank or fair to argue that because under these wretched and disheartening conditions the population does not increase it is useless to give Alaska a chance?

It would be as logical to say that because swamp lands do not produce crops therefore they should not be drained, or to say that because few people have gone from the Atlantic to the Pacific by way of Panama, what is the use of digging a canal.

Alaska is starving for the want of railroads and for necessary legislation. Because it is starved it is not growing, and because it is not growing they say what is the use of helping it.

Does that kind of logic appeal to you? If it does, you should vote against this bill.

Such logic reminds me of a certain Oklahoma farmer. The corn crop was very short, but this gentleman had a lot of old corn in his cribs. He also had a large herd of stock hogs on hand. He was very closefisted and he grudged the hogs that 75-cent corn. He fed them very sparingly, so sparingly that they didn't get fat enough to market. They didn't even grow. He kept doling out the corn in this fashion till it was all gone, and the hogs looked as if they were being trained for a Marathon race.

Had he fed them properly—rushed them, as our farmers say-he could have sold them at a good price and had corn left.

The opponents of this bill seem to approve of his method. Like the farmer's hogs, Alaska is wasting from inanition while surrounded by marvelous opportunities for growth and development which it can not use, but they point to its emaciated condition, poke fun at it, and tell us it is growing leaner. They would have advised the farmer that his hogs were doing no good, and he should save his corn. Why throw it away by feeding it to them? The friends of this bill would have advised him to feed his hogs enough corn, to rush them, to develop them, and realize on them. Where do you stand?

Put Alaska on its feet, give its people a chance to develop its great resources, and a healthy increase in its population will soon follow, but do not cramp and harass it with bad laws and then condemn it because it does not grow. To do that is to add insult to injury.

RAILROADS PRIMARY NEED.

It is contended that even though the Government should adopt the policy of building railroads in Alaska, it should wait until the Territory is settled up, until it has a considerable population. This position is altogether untenable. In Alaska the conditions are such that the building of railroads, coupled with the enactment of liberal leasing and homestead laws, must precede any real development.

If the mines of Alaska are to be developed in any degree commensurate with the mineral resources of the Territory, efficient and proper machinery is a prerequisite. But how can such machinery be gotten to the mines without railroads? Would you transport heavy boilers and engines across the mountains and over the plains for hundreds of miles on dog sleds?

You can not get the necessary machinery to the mines nor can you get large quantities of ores from them without railroads, nor can you hope for the employment of large numbers of men in the mines without such machinery, and unless large numbers of men are employed in developing its mineral resources there will be little need for developing its agricultural resources, and the great storehouse will remain locked. What they tell us should come last must come first. Railroads in Alaska will be a cause, not a consequence. They must precede, not follow, a great growth in population. The ox team and the mule team do not and can not constitute a key to unlock that Alaskan door. There is only one key that will fit that lock, namely, railroads.

But how will the building of railroads through the Territory effect such a change? By making its great wealth easier of ac-That has been the experience of the whole world. Ancient Rome did not confine its efforts in road building to the Appian Way. It made roads through the forests of Germany, it made roads in Gaul and in Britain. It could neither have utilized nor retained its hold upon these countries otherwise.

Great Britain did not wait until her possessions in Africa were populated before building the Cape to Cairo railroad. Russia built her trans-Siberian line through regions practically uninhabited. We built, at the people's expense, several transcontinental lines through territory practically uninhabited. In none of these instances were the industrial reasons for building s strong as they are in this case.

Coal, copper, and gold in great abundance lie in places now practically inaccessible, so far as economical production is concerned. Heartbreaking journeys by the most primitive methods prohibit immigration, and isolation from the outside world also tends to discourage it.

A few trunk-line railroads properly located would very largely overcome these difficulties. With such lines in operation modern machinery could be carried at reasonable cost to where it is so much needed. The journey inland, now so difficult, could then be made quickly, safely, and cheaply by rail. Mail could be delivered with reasonable frequency and regularity. The people in the interior would be connected with the outside world; they would become a part of civilization.

Under present conditions the miners at work in the mountains far away from cities have to quit the season's work in time to get back to civilization before the winter storms set in, but with railroads available they could remain at work longer in the autumn and return earlier in the spring, besides avoiding the dangers and discomforts of long journeys afoot or on dog sleds. Under these new conditions men who work in the mines and on the railroads would bring their wives and families to Alaska and establish homes. These would have to be fed and clothed and housed. The demand for food supplies would increase so that it would pay to raise such supplies there, and thus the agricultural land would be brought into actual All these results may be reasonably expected to follow the building of railroads and the enactment of liberal and practical laws for the utilization of both mineral and agricultural land, but they can not be expected to precede them.

This seems so plain and so clear that it is not easy to understand how there can be serious difference of opinion about it. This is the conclusion reached by almost every Government official and every disinterested person who has been face to face with the problem. President Roosevelt and President Taft, when in the White House, officially recommended the building of railroads in Alaska by the Government. Secretary of the Interior Fisher, after a trip to Alaska, said:

What Alaska needs more than all else is a trunk-line railroad from the ocean to the great interior valleys of the Yukon and the Tanana, opening the country so that its future development may really be possible.

It was his judgment that the Government should build such a line.

President Wilson, in his message to Congress on December 2, well and wisely said:

A duty faces us with regard to Alaska which seems to me very pressing and very imperative. * * * Alaska, as a storehouse, should be unlocked. One key to it is a system of rallways. These the Government should itself build and administer, and the ports and terminals it should itself control in the interest of all who wish to use them for the service and development of the country and its people.

Secretary of the Interior Lane says that a system of Government-built railroads in Alaska is the one way to make that country a real part of the world. It is the policy which will develop the Territory most safely and speedily, making its resources available to the whole people.

The Alaska Railroad Commission, consisting of Jay J. Morrow, major, Corps of Engineers, of the United States Army; Alfred H. Brooks, of the United States Geological Survey; Leonard M. Cox, civil engineer, of the United States Navy; and Colin M. Ingersoll, consulting engineer, after a very thorough, careful, and scientific survey of the whole field, unanimously recommended that the work of building the railroads called for by this bill should be undertaken at once and prosecuted with vigor; that the development of the Territory can not be accomplished without providing the railroads they recommend under some system which will insure low transportation charges and the consequent rapid settlement of this new land and the utilization of its great resources.

They also say:

The data presented shows that the United States possesses in Alaska a frontier territory of great size and of wonderful industrial possibilities. The commission believes that its climate is favorable to permanent settlement and to agriculture; that its mineral resources are vast and as yet but little exploited; that its population is sparse, but only by reason of its inadequate transportation facilities; and that its people are of the same type of hardy pioneers that have carried the United States frontier to its present limits.

In a recent report on mining in Alaska in 1913 by the Geological Survey, the director, Mr. George Otis Smith, says that no marked progress can be expected in mining in the inland region until a system of transportation is provided.

Mr. Seth Mann, as the personal representative of President Wilson, made a tour through Alaska last June and July and reported the results of his investigation direct to the President. The information which he furnishes is so full and so recent, and his views are so sound and conservative, that I take the liberty to quote at some length from his report. He says:

There are two primary requirements for the opening up and development of Alaska: First, the construction of railroads, roads, and trails; and, second, the opening up of the coal fields. These two projects should go forward with equal steps, since each is dependent upon the other.

I am convinced that this work of the building of railroads, as well as the construction of roads and trails, should be carried forward by the Government directly. There is nothing definite or certain in regard to the building of railroads by private enterprise, either unaided or with Government assistance. The traffic to support Alaska railroads must be in large part developed by the road itself through the settlement of the country, induced by increased transportation facilities. When the Berling River and Matanuska coal fields are opened by appropriate legislation, railroads to these fields would no doubt be constructed by private enterprise. The opening of these coal fields is, however, a separate problem, and until that problem is satisfactorily solved there will not be sufficient coal traffic to induce the building of railroads to the fields. It may take some considerable time to enact legislation that will result in the satisfactory working of these great deposits. In the meanwhile, it must be assumed that railroad development by private enterprise to the coal fields would be delayed until it became apparent that the legislation would result in the immediate opening of the coal measures.

Alaska needs at once one and probably two railroads. One should run from the coast to the Tanana and the Yukon, and the other from the coast in a northwesterly direction at least as far as the valley of the Kuskokwim River. I can not believe that any railroads of this length will be constructed by private enterprise for many years to come. If this be true, such development of that portion of Alaska beyond the Chugach Mountains and as far as the Yukon and the Kuskokwim Rivers must be indefinitely delayed. From the Chugach Mountains to the Yukon River is about 300 miles, and the distance to the Kuskokwim River in a general westerly direction is about the same. The country is rich in precious metals and other mineral wealth, which up to the present time have been but slightly developed. The construction of railroads through this country would at once give a sharp impetus to prospectors. The miners and prospectors of Alaska lay great stress upon the difficulties which surround prospecting in this Territory at any distance beyond 100 miles from the coast or from navigable rivers. With railroad transportation into this country the prospector could remain in the field, if not twice as long, at least two months longer than he can at the present time. He must enter the field under present conditions late in the year and return again from a month to two months earlier than would be necessary if these railroads were built, since he can not risk the severities of the Alaskan winter, which may prove fatal if he starts out too early and returns too late. The principal resources of the interior of Alaska are its mineral wealth. It is the universal opinion of all A

The evidence is uniform, complete, and overwhelming. No other nation would hesitate a moment, but we have been so accustomed to the very best of conditions as to soil, climate, and all that that we look with suspicion on anything not in the very first rank in all these respects. But common prudence, ordinary business foresight, and true patriotism all urge that we begin now, and begin right, to lay the foundations for a great empire State in this far northern land.

COST OF BUILDING.

It is also contended that the Government can not build these railroads as cheaply as private concerns could, and therefore the Government should not build them at all.

Even if this contention were true, it would not be anything like a sufficient reason for not building them.

But is it true? In answering this question we should consider not alone the cash outlay or first cost of building these roads; we should consider also the final or ultimate result to the American people.

Any other test would not be sound, and when this reasonable test is applied I do not hesitate to say that it will be a wise investment. The Government can build these railroads, and own them when they are built, for far less than it has heretofore given away to other roads constructed under private management and ownership. I believe the Pacific roads would have been built at less cost to the people had the Government done the work itself.

The Government has carried on many enterprises with satisfactory economy. I am inclined to believe that in some very large enterprises the Government can do the work as well, or better, than private concerns. Who will say the Panama Canal could have been constructed more successfully by private interests? Or who will say that the success achieved in that instance can not under the same or similar supervision be duplicated in Alaska?

No doubt the Government would pay its employees better wages and treat them better than private concerns would do in far-off Alaska. And it might have to pay more in some other ways than private concerns would pay. But in the matter of financing the enterprise the Government would have a tremendous advantage and could make a big saving over a private concern.

Mr. Falcon Joslin, who has done some railroad building in Alaska, and who is very familiar with conditions there, was before the Committee on Territories in July last. He said:

One of the greatest advantages from Government ownership is the fact that the capital to construct the roads can be obtained by the Government at 3 per cent; that is, at the present time. I doubt whether it can be obtained at that rate for a long time, because the rate of interest is steadily going up. If a private concern attempted to promote such a venture, or if I myself sought to find capital for an Alaskan railroad, I should offer 6 per cent bonds, with a premium of at least 50 per cent in stock. The bonds that I did float to build the road I now have were 6 per cent bonds, and they were sold at a discount—sold for 85 cents on the dollar—and there was a premium of 75 per cent in stock. The Government would avoid that outlay.

Let us examine a little the matter of railroad building under private management and see whether the Government and the people have not been pretty heavy losers through their reliance on the alleged economy of private enterprise. In his book, The Railroads, the Trusts, and the People, Prof. Frank Parsons devotes a chapter to railroad graft and official abuse. Referring to the Pacific railroads he says:

These companies received enormous land grants and subsidies from the National Government and the States—more than enough to build and equip the whole of the lines. Yet they bonded the roads for twice what they cost, and in addition issued stock to an amount largely in excess of the actual cost. The people really paid for the roads, but the promoters took the ownership and possession, raised millions of dollars by the issue of fictitious securities, and through construction frauds and other inequitable practices put the bulk of the money into their own private pockets.

In the case of the Central and Union Pacific roads resources amounting to $260,000 a mile were put into the hands of a few men to do work costing apparently about $31,000 a mile, and the public that paid for the roads several times over got nothing but a second mortgage for part of the money they put in.

I will not attempt to guete all the facts and figures which I will not attempt to quote all the facts and figures which Dr. Parsons gives concerning the building of the Central Pacific and the Union Pacific lines, as well as other lines. Indeed, the waste and grafting which he shows existed in those cases are also found in lines privately owned. Speaking of an eastern road he says:

The South Pennsylvania Road, built by Commodore Vanderbilt to compete with the Pennsylvania Road, has been shown to have cost somewhere between six and ten millions. A responsible contractor had offered to build it for $6,500,000. Yet a construction company, composed of Vanderbilt's clerks and brokers, received $15,000,000 for building it; and the syndicate of capitalists that supplied the money to do the work got $40,000,000 in securities, $20,000,000 bonds, and $20,000,000 stock. The cost of the road was less than $10,000,000, so that the whole of the stock and half of the bonds were fictitious. In the same manner, though not in the same proportion, the thing was worked all over the Union.

And he adds:

Excessive land grant and subsidy graft has not confined its ravages to the Pacific roads any more than construction frauds. In Iowa, for example, 5,000,000 acres of land were given to the railways, an area almost as great as that of the whole State of Massachusetts. And besides this the contributions in taxes, rights of way, depot sites, and gifts of money to the railways of this one State are estimated by a leading railroad attorney at $25,000,000, and by William Larrabee, ex-governor of Iowa, at $50,000,000.

To those who think the Government can have the work done more cheaply by private enterprise than it could by doing it directly under its own supervision the whole chapter from which I quote will make interesting reading, and will, I think, dissipate such ill-grounded notions. Summing up the situation Dr. Parsons says:

dissipate such ill-grounded notions. Summing up the situation Dr. Parsons says;

The total gifts of the public to railways by municipalities, States, and Nation can not be accurately stated, but it is known that the national land grants alone have aggregated more than 215,000,000 acres, an area far exceeding the whole of New England and the Middle States, Since 1850 the Federal Government fare granted subsidies to more than 50 railroads. Six of these companies received cash sums aggregating $65,000,000, and the Government sustained their credit by paying interest on their bonds to the extent of about $75,000,000, making a cash appropriation of about $140,000,000 to assist six railroads already enriched by empires of land. States, cities, and towns have also contributed large values to railroads in all sections of the country.

The railroad grants in Minnesota would make two States the size of Massachusetts, one of which was donated to the promoters of the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. In Kansas the railroad grants would make the two States of Connecticut and Rhode Island. In Michigan and Wisconsin also the railway pasture is nearly as large. In Montann the grants to one company would equal the whole of Maryland, New Jersey, and Massachusetts. In Washington also the grants are about equivalent to the same three States, and three States the size of New Hampshire could be carved out of the railway grants in California, The Union Pacific alone obtained 13,000,000, cares, the Kansas Pacific 42,000,000, and the Southern Pacific 47,000,000, the Atlantic & Pacific 42,000,000, and the Southern Pacific 9,520,000 acres.

The total area given by act of Congress to western roads is nearly as large as the whole extent of the original thirteen States. It is larger than the German Empire, Switzerland, Denmark, and the Netherlands; larger than the German Empire and Italy combined; larger than the Austro-Hungarian Empire, Switzerland, Denmark, and the Netherlands; larger than the German Empire and Italy combined; larger than the

The Government owns practically 99 per cent of the wealth of Alaska, mineral and agricultural, and the building of the roads provided for in this bill will increase the value of it far beyond the expense incurred. When the roads are built undoubtedly all lines of endeavor there will be stimulated and the demand for opportunities greatly increased.

Such consequences always follow railroad development.

The grant of land to the Illinois Central Railroad was made in 1850, but the road was not completed till September, 1856. In the decade from 1850 to 1860 the population of the State more than doubled.

In 1850 land like that given the company was on sale at $1.25 an acre, with no takers. Indeed, much of it was offered through soldiers' land warrants at 70 cents an acre, and could find no purchasers, but by 1852, with a railroad in prospect. it sold readily at $5 an acre.

This has invariably been the history of new countries after the introduction of railroads, and Alaska will be no exception. RAILROADS WILL NOT PAY.

It is also contended by the opponents of the bill that these railroads will not pay when built; therefore the Government should not build them.

I readily concede that they will not pay dividends in money at first, but I am confident they will pay dividends in the greater progress and development of Alaska from the very day they begin to operate, and I am also confident that they will eventually pay dividends in money, if that is desired. The Government has in the past yery materially aided in the construction of a large number of railroads. As I have shown, it has given away hundreds of millions of acres of public land to aid in the building of some 16,000 miles of railroad. Did that investment pay a dividend? Did anybody expect it to pay a dividend in cash? It was expected that it would aid in the development of the country, that it would add to the general prosperity and render possible the establishment of additional homes for our people. True, much of that land was given away recklessly—almost criminally; but even at that the country has received dividends-large dividends-in the more rapid growth of the country and the spread of general prosperity.

Surely, the Government's activities are not to be confined to enterprises which will pay dividends in cash.

The genial and persuasive chairman of the Good Roads Committee [Mr. Shackleford] wants Congress to appropriate twentyfive millions to aid in building good roads through the States, and unless his right eye loses its cunning he will get it. it is expended in making better post roads, do gentlemen expect the Government to collect a cash dividend on the investment? When we appropriate money for dredging and deepening navigable waters, do we expect a direct return in money? smaller governmental units, such as counties and municipalities, tax property to open up roads and streets and keep them in repair, do they expect a money dividend from the expenditure? Of course not. In every such case the object is the general welfare. The expenditure is never put on a dividend basis, and it never should be.

Canada will soon have completed the construction of a rail-road from the Atlantic to the Pacific, 3,600 miles long. Winnipeg is midway this distance. East of that city the Canadian Government undertook the work of construction itself. West of it they let the construction contract to the Grand Trunk Railroad Co., and they guaranteed that company three-fourths of the principal sum and the interest on that much of the bonds, and in addition they agreed to pay the interest on these guaranteed bonds for seven years as a pure gift. This road, for almost its entire length from near Halifax, New Brunswick, on the Atlantic coast to Prince Rupert on the Pacific coast, runs through territory which is either sparsely settled or wholly uninhabited. The building of this line will cost, not $35,000.000 but $300,000,000, and three-fourths of that amount, or $225, 000,000, is guaranteed by the Canadian Government, in addition to the gratuity of seven years' interest on that amount.

What is the reason for this liberality? Is the Canadian Government looking forward to cash dividends on this investment? Not at all. The reason for its liberality is given in a preamble to the bill which provides for the building of the road. Here it is:

Whereas, by reason of the growth in population and the rapid development in productiveness and trade of Canada, and especially of the western part thereof, and with a view to the opening up of new territory available for settlement both in eastern Provinces and in the west, and the affording of transportation facilities for such territory, and for other reasons the necessity has arisen for such construction of a national transcontinental railway.

The Canadians do not ask, Will this road pay dividends? They simply say it will open up new territory to settlement; that is all. They do not claim that it will tap some of the richest mineral sections to be found anywhere, for it will not do so. Every reason they give for this enormous expenditure applies in Alaska, and there are many other reasons in support of our case that have no application in theirs; yet who will say they are not justified in what they are doing? But if they are justified, how much more are we justified?

A government which considers great measures and adopts or rejects them on the theory that they will or will not pay dividends has outlived its usefulness. There are better things than cash dividends. The greatness of a nation can not be measured by the contents of its treasury alone.

The Acropolis and the Parthenon put no money in the treasury of Athens but they were well worth while. The construcury of Athens, but they were well worth while. The construction of the Appian Way was a drain on the treasury of Rome, but it contributed to promote the general welfare. The Washington Monument, so typical of the great character it commemorates, as a dividend paying investment is a signal failure, but where is the man who would lower its towering apex one single inch? The question with a great government should be, not will it pay, but will it make for the general welfare; and in the case before us the answer is emphatically that it will.

WEALTH OF ALASKA.

I have assumed that Alaska is a land of great natural opportunities. Its great fisheries are conceded, but they do not materially affect the present question. This is also measurably true of its trade in furs. But it is of its mineral wealth and its agricultural possibilities I would now speak.

So much has been said on both these topics by those better informed about them than I am that I approach the subject with some hesitation. Since 1880 the Territory has produced $248,300,000 worth of mineral wealth. Of this, $228,200,000 was gold, $16,580,000 copper, $2,060,000 silver, and only $360,000 of it was coal.

The great preponderance of gold over copper is due in part to the fact that gold can be carried on the person, whereas copper is bulky and must be transported by rail.

COAL.

The coal situation has been the subject of so much discussion that little more need be said about it.

I want, however, to call attention to an error which my genial friend from Virginia was led into by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. Madden]. He suggested to the gentleman from Virginia that an experiment made on the Maryland developed the fact that Bering River coal had only 43 per cent of the fuel value of Pocahontas coal for naval purposes. read from the speech of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT]:

Hon. James S. Davenport, M. C., House of Representatives.

My Dear Mr. Davenport: The preliminary report of the tests of Bering River washed and screened coal at the engineering experiment station, Annapolis, Md., notes that under similar conditions Bering River coal produced only about 75 per cent of the power gotten with Pocahontas.

The department therefore notes with regret that the Bering River coal sample has thus far proved unsuitable for naval use.

Sincerely, yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Acting Secretary of the Navy.

It will be seen that that is 75 per cent and not 43 per cent. This is indicative of the unconscious exaggeration to which I referred.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not like to, but I will yield to my colleague.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But the gentleman is taking up my time.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. The test on the Maryland was 43 per cent and the test at Annapolis was 75 per cent.

Mr, GRAHAM of Illinois. The statement of my colleague shows the perfect unreliability of these tests. One test shows the Bering coal to be only 43 per cent of the fuel value of the Pocahontas coal, and another test of the same coal shows it to be 75 per cent, an increase of 32 per cent. May I not assume that at that rate of increase the third test will show it to be 107 per cent of the Pocahontas? My friend from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] said that the exposure of coal did not materially interfere with its value as fuel. That is a mistake. When coal is exposed to the atmosphere oxidation takes place; the oxygen in the atmosphere unites with the coal, causing slow combustion, and its effectiveness is thus lowered. There is no mine in the Bering coal field.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Will the gentleman allow an interruption? Mr. GRAHAM of Illinols, I will; but my time is very short, Mr. SAUNDERS. I said it did affect it to some extent, and it would depend entirely upon the time which it had been exposed.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Well, this coal has been exposed for perhaps a million years.

Mr. SAUNDERS. We had no evidence before us as to how long it had been exposed.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It has been on the surface of those coal fields for a great many years. Now, that coal was loaded into bags; it was lying there exposed for a long time before it was transported to the place where these tests were made.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Did not they have to dig into the coal bed to get 500 tons?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They had to dig into it somewhat, suppose

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I can not yield; my time is too short.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. But the gentleman does. When one Member interrupts, and then another and another interrupts, it takes considerable time, all together.

Mr. FERRIS. I simply wanted to say that this coal was taken out of a tunnel 100 feet below the ground.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I know of no such tunnel in that coal field. If there is one, I have not heard of it. But I am not going to hang my case on the matter of coal for naval use, because the Secretary of the Navy says that in the future we will not rely on coal. We must, however, to some extent, as we now have many ships that have to rely on coal.

Some of these ships will be in the Pacific and they will need coal, and in time of peace certainly this coal would be of value to them. We might need a supply of the better quality of coal only in case of war, which I hope will not occur. Then, again, this report says that they have not tested the Matanuska field The testimony is that out of the 40 square miles of coal in the Bering field and the 75 square miles of coal in the Matanuska one-half is of the highest grade of anthracite. heard the sworn statements of the two men best qualified to express an opinion upon this subject, from a theoretical point of view, Mr. Brooks, of the Geological Survey, and Mr. Andrew Kennedy, the mining expert of the Government in Alaska, and both of them testified it was practically equal to the Pocahontas coal, as shown by an analysis of it. What the event will prove to be I do not know. If, as opponents of the bill suggest, we are to have a railroad to reach the Matanuska field, we go a large part of the way to Fairbanks. We go far toward tapping the valley of the Tanana, and having gone that far, even on the logic of my friend from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS], it were the height of folly there to stop and not go on to the navigable waters of the Tanana and the Yukon. He concedes that we ought to go to the Matanuska. On that concession I claim that it were unwise not to go through that valley, fertile, at least, for Alaska, and reach the navigable waters of the Tanana and the Yukon. So that the gentleman concedes the wisdom of building at least one of these railroads.

Mr. SAUNDERS. But these are entirely different roads. Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; the Matanuska field is on the proposed line from Seward to Fairbanks. The gentleman is rusty on the geography of the question he is discussing.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I am looking at it here right now. Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. And even if it should prove somewhat inferior to the best Pocahontas coal it would still be very valuable. It would at least serve for naval use in time of peace. and it would be of great commercial value along the whole Pacific coast, where it has no rival.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] says we have coal enough in the States to last several thousand years. That is not quite the question. The real point is to get plenty of good coal near the place where it is needed, and this Alaska coal is much nearer a vast number of people who need it than any other coal of nearly equal quality.

Here is the situation as I see it: I do not say that we should build these railroads merely for the purpose of developing agriculture in Alaska. I say that we ought to build them primarily to develop the great mineral possibilities of that country, keeping agriculture in mind as an important incident. Let me read to you from the testimony, not a mere statement, but the sworn testimony of the man who knows more about the mineral qualities of Alaska than any man living, Prof. Albert Brooks, or Mr. Albert Brooks, as he prefers to be called. Speaking of the Bonanza copper mine, he testified:

That is an enormously rich deposit,

He further said:

In the Bonanza mine the ore runs from 20 to 30 per cent, and in ome cases from 40 to 50 per cent, pure metallic copper. It is very

In answer to a question as to how far these conditions extended, he said that they practically extended along the entire mountain range, a distance of about 150 miles.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Forty per cent of copper the whole way? Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I did not intend to say that. Here are Mr. Brooks's words:

That these conditions are likely to repeat themselves in places all along the copper belt for 150 miles, but we do not know that they do. But as far as we can tell from the surface the same conditions may arise elsewhere. * * * I think there is a strong probability that other deposits will be found similar in character to the Bonanza.

And he adds that this copper has a mixture of silver running up to $5 a ton.

There are places in this mine where the copper is even 70 per cent pure, and Mr. Brooks says that where the winter and the spring eroded the mountain side, washing the lighter substances away, copper has been shoveled up that was 95 per cent pure metallic copper.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman did not think that I interrupted him for a question that was irrelevant. I understood him to say that the Bonanza mine, which I am informed belongs to the Guggenheims, runs from '0 to 50 per cent of pure copper, and I asked if that was through the whole mountain range.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Oh, no. What I read says that it does not continue all of the way, but that it repeats itself along the mountain range for 150 miles. Mr. Chairman, we are beginning to know the value of copper. The extended use of electricity makes it an exceedingly valuable product, but these deposits are hundreds of miles in the interior and can be handled only by railways. True, one railroad now taps it, and branches from that one can reach out farther, but because the coal mines are not developed the railroads are handicapped, and are of little value on account of the great expense in running

We must get some railroads that will enable them to reach these opportunities. I do not care how liberal your homestead law is, nobody is going there to locate on a homestead if he can not get to it and from it with reasonable convenience and 3x-

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If it is important, I will yield, of course. I do not like to be discourteous, but you know how quickly the minutes slip by in a case of this sort.

Mr. FERRIS. I do, indeed.

PRIVATE ENTERPRISE WILL NOT BUILD THEM,

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Now, then, I assume it to be true that if Alaska is to be developed we must have railroads. we are to unlock this door we-must have a key with which to we are to unlock this door we-must have a key with which to unlock it. What is the key? It is a few trunk-line railroads, as the President has said. Some gentlemen say that private enterprise will build them. I say it will not. Even syndicated wealth will not build them. The Alaskan Syndicate, the Guggenheim-Morgan syndicate, or "Morganheim," as some call it, would doubtless have gone on and built railroads in Alaska, but only on one condition, and that is the condition on which they built the railroad they constructed there-that they would have a free hand in Alaska, and they could for their own use exploit that Territory for all time. Turn the mineral wealth of Alaska over to them and they will build the necessary railroads for such exploitation, but when you do it you will develop a condition of things there for the future far worse than history can point to in the worst days of feudalism. Do we want that? Will we reject the doctrine of conservation? Will we turn all these resources away from the American people, who now own 99 per cent of them? Will we turn them over to the Guggenheims and the other syndicates that will be created? If we do, they will build the necessary trunk lines and develop the wealth that is there. But the American people will not consent to that; they will not give these mineral lands away.

AGRICULTURE.

I have said that I think agriculture in Alaska will follow the development of its mineral resources rather than precede them. This has been largely true of California, Idaho, Montana, Colorado, and other States rich in mineral wealth.

But we are told the climate and soil are leagued against the farmer in Alaska to such an extent as to render farming impracticable; that the temperature is so low and the season so short, success in maturing crops is not possible.

The average length of the crop-growing season at Fairbanks its short season it is a great agricultural valley with a population of 23,000, with $6,000,000 in bank deposits. Many other agricultural regions have a crop-growing season shorter than the season at Fairbanks, and have not the advantage of long days, with almost continuous sunshine during the growing period, as the Tanana Valley has. The lowest temperature the Government has any record of at Fairbanks is 65° below zero. That temperature has been reached at Miles City, Mont., and in the Milk River country in Montana, where the Government is now spending millions on irrigation projects, and yet Montana has demonstrated that it is a great agricultural State.

The lowest temperature recorded in Florida is 2° below zero; the thermometer has never fallen even to zero on the southern coast of Alaska. Oklahoma has a record of 25° below and Missouri 29°, while 1° above zero is the lowest temperature yet recorded in Cordova.

The great valleys of the Yukon, the Tanana, and the Kuskokwim compare more than favorably in soil and climate with Norway, Sweden, and Finland, and Alaska far surpasses these countries in mineral wealth, yet Norway has a population of 2,300,000, Sweden 5,500,000, and Finland 3,000,000, or 10,800,000 in all, mainly supported by agriculture. Alaska has more territory than all three and will some time in the future have as large or even a larger population. We should now give it a good start and head it in the right direction.

There is no question that root crops, vegetables, rye, barley, and oats can be grown very successfully there, and that wheat can also be grown, but we need not expect very extensive crops of cereals so long as the Alaskans have to thrash with fiails because of the lack of transportation for thrashing machines.

Mr. Seth Mann, in his report to the President, says:

The agricultural possibilities of the interior of Alaska are a revelation one who visits the great valleys of the Yukon and Tanana for the to one whe

He says-

When once the land is prepared for cultivation the long periods of sunshine during the summer months operate like intensive cultivation and bring about rapid germination and quick maturing of crops.

Mr. S. Hall Young, superintendent of the Presbyterian mission, who has lived in Alaska for 35 years, in a recent letter to the able chairman of the Committee on the Territories [Mr. Houston] says:

I have successfully raised and ripened in my own garden and fields there wheat, oats, barley, potatoes, turnips, rutabagas, tomatoes, peas, radishes, lettuce, carrots, and other vegetables also.

While the temperature sometimes drops very low, the winters are by no means as bad as some suppose. Mr. Young says on that subject .

My wife and I were out calling on our parishioners during the coldest weather of each year and did not suffer from cold. The children in the schools at Fairbanks lost no time from their lessons on account of the weather. The entire absence of wind during these periods of cold weather is a striking characteristic of the climate. Indeed, I have never known a wind strong enough to drift the snow in the vicinity of Fairbanks.

During most of the winter the temperature ranged from 10° above zero to 20° below. There were no sudden changes, and woodmen, lumbermen, and travelers were busily at work, the mails coming in regularly, and the population in general living without discomfort. It is a dependable climate, and you know to-day about what the weather to-morrow is likely to be.

Mining was being carried on all of this time without hindrance from the weather. There was very little snow and very little cloudy weather.

And as to the people and the general conditions there, Mr. Young says:

The population (white) of interior Alaska will compare well in intelligence, morals, physical strength, and character with any other population elsewhere. The people are contented and love the land of their adoption, and it has become a proverb in central Alaska that if any one of the people who have lived there for some years goes "outside" he must come back. For my part, I know of no land under the sun where I would rather live, work, and die than interior Alaska. GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

It is useless to try to frighten folk with the cry of Government ownership of railroads. That question is not involved in this measure. This is an extraordinary case and needs an extraordinary remedy. We can not be frightened from doing the right thing in this case for fear we would be asked to do the same thing later in a different case. We must, like sensible men, cross the bridges after we reach them and not before we reach them.

If ever the question of Government ownership comes up in the States the Congress then in office will be amply able to deal with the question on its merits.

This question should be dealt with now on its merits and in view of our present light on the subject.

The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] told us the other for the last five years is 105 days. I mean the summer season between killing frosts. The average season at Ellensburg, Vash., in the Kittitas Valley, is only 90 days, but in spite of an acre was required to clear the land. I concede a man could go to Alaska and spend $200 in clearing an acre of land You can spend a great amount of money clearing an acre of timberland in Oklahoma, too, if you go there in the spring and get it ready for a crop that year. I take from the gentleman's own speech a quotation which fully answers his

Mr. McKenzie. I have had a little experience in clearing land up in the interior of Alaska, and if you can get a burn on the ground and kill those trees the roots will lie on the top of the frost, and in two or three years you can go along there and almost kick them out. It is very easy. Of course if you do it in one season it is a very expensive system.

There is the common sense of the situation. When men clear land ordinarily they begin by deadening the trees. a while, when they are dead enough to burn, they burn them. If they get in a hurry, of course, they pull the stumps or blast them out. That is expensive, but if they wait a few years the stumps can be easily and cheaply disposed of. Then, too, the Alaska homesteader could use his own and his family's labor instead of hiring men at $8 a day.

REINDEER.

There is another aspect of the question which has received but little notice during the debate.

It is almost certain they can raise an ample supply of meat for home consumption and before another decade passes the people of the States may be looking Alaskaward for help in the solution of the meat question. A year and a half ago I ate with much relish reindeer steak imported from Alaska.

It was only 12 years ago that 1,280 head of reindeer were imported from Siberia. Their descendants now number 46,000, and the annual increase is 30 per cent. If this rate of increase continues, by 1920 there will be almost 300,000 head.

Experts estimate that Alaska has enough grazing ground to support from ten to twenty million head of them.

The claims of Alaska can not be answered by exhausting adjectives and epithets in a vain attempt to heap ridicule upon it.

It is no answer to say, or even to prove, that agricultural opportunities are not as good there as in some of the States. It is enough to show that they are too good to remain unde-

It is no answer to say that frost may sometimes injure or yen destroy the crops. That has happened in Oklahoma, in even destroy the crops. Illinois, in Florida, in California, and in almost every State in But who says we should abandon effort in those the Union. States on that account?

Nor is it an answer to say there are various difficulties in the way so long as they are not insuperable. It is the conquest of difficulties which makes men strong individually and racially, and the difficulties in Alaska can be conquered. They are not greater than they once were in Finland. But the Finns are a strong race mentally and physically. Their great national strong race mentally and physically. epic, the Kalevala, has a recognized place in literature and undoubtedly furnished the model for Longfellow's Hiawatha.

The champion long-distance runner of the world at this time is a Finn. In the long-distance contests in Alaska the native half-breeds win the prizes. Alaska offers as great opportunit- for human development as Finland does and is bound to eventually have a population of millions of stalwart, brave, hardy, intelligent, liberty-loving citizens, worthy of the best traditions of the Republic. But it must first have means of communication with the rest of the country and with the outside world. This it can not have for ages unless the Government builds some trunk lines. The building of them will assuredly inaugurate the change. Alaska will do the rest.

Gentlemen fear that if we spend $35,000,000 or $40,000,000 now it will grow to $400,000,000 later on. That objection might have been urged with as much reason against the aid given the Pacific lines. But, as matter of fact, in the territory where some 5,000 miles of railroad were built by Government aid there are now 50,000 miles. The trunk lines have been supplemented by feeders built by private enterprise. It will be so in Alaska,

The time for action is here. We must prepare to unlock this storehouse. We must adopt a wise, forward-looking policy for it. We must give enterprise and industry a chance to seize and develop the opportunities awaiting them. We must provide Alaska with liberal mineral-leasing laws, with liberal and inexpensive homestead laws; but first of all we must provide access to it by giving it the railroads provided for in this bill. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3439. An act appropriating funds for the purpose of the investigation, treatment, and eradication of hog cholera.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 9574. An act to authorize the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River near the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3625) to authorize the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River near the city of Hannibal, in the State of Missouri.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House resolution 8.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives, to be distributed through the folding room, 50,000 copies of House Document No. 1458, Sixty-second Congress, same being "Prayers offered at the opening of the sessions of the Sixty-second Congress of the United States."

The message also announced that the President had, on February 3, 1914, approved bill of the following title:

S. 541. An act granting to the Emigration Canon Railroad Co., a corporation of the State of Utah, permission, in so far as the United States is concerned, to occupy, for a right of way for its railroad track, a certain piece of land now included in the Mount Olivet Cemetery, Salt Lake County, Utah.

RAILROADS IN ALASKA.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA

FOLLETTE] is recognized.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the Federal Government building and, if necessary, operating a rail-road in Alaska. For more than 100 years the transportation problem has been probably more paramount than any other. It was fully recognized throughout the length and breadth of our country that the greatest handicap to advancement was the lack of ways and means for entrance into and egress from the various settlements of our Commonwealth and lack of transportation facilities for people and freight. The Federal Government showed its appreciation of that condition in 1802, when it appropriated one-twentieth of the proceeds of public-land sales in he Ohio territory to the construction of highways. Later the Government authorized the construction of the Cumberland Road or National Pike, which started from the center of population in Maryland, extended from there into the Ohio country, eventually reaching as far west as Vandalia, Ill., the Government expending thereon some $10,000,000.

This movement was followed by Government aid to various canal projects and Federal aid to rivers and harbors. The country developed under these transportation facilities to such an extent as to awaken the public mind fully to transportation advantages and to the immense disadvantage localities were subjected to which had no such blessings. This knowledge led to continuous efforts on the part of communities, States, and Territories to secure transportation facilities, and as time passed not only the Federal Government was importuned for aid to transportation facilities of various kinds, but also States, counties, and municipalities, and prior to the year 1850 by far the largest amount of paternal aid came from the latter-named

In addition to this, the United States made land grants to States for transportation purposes, which in turn regranted to railroads, the total land grants thus made for this purpose by the States and Federal Government totaling approximately 155,000,000 acres, which if worth only an average of $2.50 per acre would amount to $387,500,000.

In addition to this, counties and municipalities bonded themselves to an amount approximating $500,000,000, making first and last various sums of governmental aid to our United States railroads approximating $1,500,000,000.

Dr. William Z. Ripley, professor of economies in Harvard University, estimates that Federal Government and various State, county, and municipal aid to railroad construction amounts to at least two-fifths of the total value of all railroads.

Our States and municipalities have not only assisted in railroad construction by subsidies, but have frequently built railroads and parts of railroads themselves. The Interstate Commerce Commission furnishes data which cover in part some of the States and the mileage they hold under State control. While it does not comprise much mileage, it does illuminate the fact that those States recognize the right and, in some cases, the expediency of Government ownership of railroads. The list is as follows:

Belt Raliroad of San Francisco; the Belt yard is a State property under the jurisdiction of the Board of State Harbor Commissioners of California.

Cincinnati Southern Raliway, operated by the Cincinnati, New Orleans & Texas Pacific Rallway Co.; built and owned by the city of Cincinnati

Plattsburgh & Dannemora Raliroad, operated by the Delaware & Hudson Co.; property of the State of New York.

Oregon State Portage Rallway; owned and operated by the State of Oregon.

Texas State Raliroad; property of the State of Texas.

Western & Atlantic Raliroad, operated by the Nashville, Chattanooga & St. Louis Raliway; owned by the State of Georgia.

The last suppul propert of the North Cary, ing. Raliroad Co. to

The last annual report of the North Carc'ina Railroad Co. to the Interstate Commerce Commission shows that the company owned 223.55 miles of road in North Carolina, which was leased to the Southern Railway Co. From unofficial sources it is understood that the State of North Carolina owns $3,000,200 of the $4,000,000 ontstanding capital stock of that company.

Mr. Chairman, the States of New York and Massachusetts have each individually appropriated as much for aid of railroads as the Federal Government is asked to appropriate in this case, or nearly so-New York more than $31,000,000 and Massachusetts more than $41,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the people of the United States have furnished more than $1,000,000,000 for building transportation lines in the past, I do not think that they will criticize or blame the American Congress for making this comparatively small appropriation for construction of a railroad through their own great country, Alaska, with more than 95 per cent of its total resources yet within the direct control of the people, the Government of the United States.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenroot] and the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. Wickersham] quoted freely from the testimony of John E. Ballaine, of Seattle and Alaska, before the House and Senate Committees on the Territories, in which Mr. Ballaine told of his negotiations with the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., through G. W. Perkins, in an effort to induce them to finance a narrow-gauge railroad from the southern coast of Alaska to the Tanana River, and of the refusal of the Morgans to finance the enterprise because the Guggenheim brothers ob-jected. That testimony by Mr. Ballaine entered largely also in the Senate debates on this bill, and has afforded convincing reasons why it is necessary for the United States to build a system of railroads in Alaska.

Let me call your attention particularly to the fact that strenuous efforts have been made to get a denial from Mr. Perkins, and that all such efforts have failed. Not only have they failed, but Senator Lippitr in the Senate admitted the correctness of Mr. Ballaine's statements. Those of us who know Mr. Ballaine knew that his statements were correct, but it is doubly important to have an admission from the opponents of this bill that he stated

Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the various speeches made by gentlemen on this bill, both for and against it, and with no little amusement at some of the suggestions made by the speakers and also by gentlemen commenting on the bill individually. I have heard men protest that they could not vote for this measure because it was establishing a precedent for paternalism and committing the Government to a policy so far-reaching in its effects that it might in time practically bankrupt the Government. Some of these gentlemen have been for years voting for river and harbor improve-ments, just as paternal in character, aggregating millions of dollars, taken from the Federal Treasury without a thought of any impropriety. Many of these sums have been applied to streams of very doubtful navigation value, and many of the appropriations made for rivers and harbors that were more local than national in character. These appropriations have been made annually for many years and at times have been criticized unmercifully, charges of fraud and scandal being freely made. But in spite of criticism and abuses, the public at large has acquiesced in the expenditures and the Government and our people have prospered. I have heard gentlemen get up here and talk against the expenditure of the people's money in the most virtuous and self-sacrificing manner who would not hesitate a minute to vote $35,000,000 or $50,000,000 for building levees along the Mississippi River, although one-half of our people have no direct benefit from it and only a negative indirect benefit, yet we all recognize the necessity of Federal aid in these matters and extend paternal help.

The honorable gentleman from the City of Brotherly Love, Mr. Moore, would not hesitate to ask for $1,000,000 for the benefit of the Delaware River, and would take a suggestion that it should not be made from the Federal Treasury because, forsooth, the Mississippi Valley and the Pacific coast get no benefits from it as a very narrow viewpoint, unworthy of Rep-resentatives of a people like ours. I heard one gentleman remark to another that the Washington delegation was in favor of this measure because a large part of the $35,000,000 would be spent there and it was like getting an appropriation for our own State. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mondell] in his speech on this question said practically the same thing. Mr. Chairman, the State of Washington is so situated geographically that it is the nearest United States point to Alaska, and the State of Washington will attempt to compete for Alaska business, just as every other State in the Union would do if favorably situated; yet I hardly think any Member here would vote against this bill simply because his State was not favorably situated to secure this business. I hope votes on this bill will be controlled by higher motives.

Mr. Chairman, I would be pleased to think that my State could get the lion's share of the expenditures made for a railroad in Alaska, for I am only human and wish my State well; but the assertion is so preposterous and shows so little knowledge of present conditions and the possibilities of my State to furnish the materials and elements necessary to use in railroad construction, that I can hardly think the remark serious. should judge that possibly the great State of Pennsylvania would get more of the actual cost of the enterprise than any one State, because of its supremacy in the manufacture of iron and steel, also locomotives and rolling stock, although many States would be competitors, and no doubt the money used for railroad building in Alaska would be widely distributed, going to many different States. My own State being as yet only a pioneer, is not prepared even to seriously consider supplying to the Government many of the constituent elements necessary. Our rolling mills are few and our manufacturing establishments in embryo. No; the Members from the State of Washington have no hopes of being the largest direct beneficiaries from the enterprise; but we do know that Alaska is a factor in our prosperity and that it will be a greater factor in future years, if the Territory can be properly developed.

I listened with much interest to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. He is always interesting and has a great fund of statistical knowledge, and no one knows better than he how to handle statistics to advantage. He gave the cost of railroad building from the census of 1910, and would have us believe that a criterion to go by in figuring railroad building in Alaska. The argument was specious and interesting, but not particularly illuminating to one groping for knowledge, and is in no way applicable to railroad costs in Alaska. We all know that railroad building, like any other construction work, has a definite minimum, but an indefinite maximum, only to be measured by the judgment and bank roll of the builder. A railroad can be constructed in Alaska if properly and honestly managed, capable of handling the heavy traffic and developing the resources of that great country at a minimum of probably

In reply to a letter of inquiry regarding cost of railroad construction in Alaska directed to Mr. J. E. Ballaine, of Seattle, Wash., president of the Tanana Construction Co., who built the first 20 miles of the Alaska Central Railroad, starting at Seward, Alaska, with a prospective terminus at the Tanana River, I received the following:

SEATTLE, WASH., December 24, 1913.

Hon. W. L. LA FOLLETTE,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. LA FOLLETTE: I have your inquiry as to the cost of building and equipping the Alaska Central Railroad, now the Alaska Northern, and as to the difference between the cost of railroad building

In Alaska and in the States. I can answer your question definitely for only the first 20 miles of the Alaska Central, which I, as president and owner of the Tanana Construction Co., built and equipped, and all of the funds for which I procured on notes of the construction company indorsed by me.

The first 20 miles of the Alaska Central starts from Seward, at the head of Resurrection Bay, and extends through a heavily timbered valley for 7 miles. From mile 8 to mile 14, inclusive, the road is on a timbered hillside, with several rock cuts from 20 to 100 feet long, several fills from 10 to 15 feet deep, and about 20 bridges made of native timber, mostly I and 2 decks and 3 to 6 bents.

The road as I built it is standard gauge, of 60-pound steel, and has 2,800 ties to the mile. The ties are 10-inch face, of native spruce and hemlock.

The road as I built it is standard gauge, of 60-pound steel, and has 2.800 thes to the mile. The ties are 10-inch face, of native spruce and hemlock.

The equipment of this first 20 miles consisted of a wharf at Seward which cost $30,000, two Baldwin locomotives each of 60 tons, five standard flat cars, a sawmill of 10,000 feet daily capacity, 15 horses and harness, and machinery to the value of $11,000.

The total cash cost of the completed railroad thus constructed and equipped was exactly $325,000, or $16,250 per mile.

After I sold the construction company, and thereby control of the Alaska Central Railroad, to Frost & Osborne in 1904, they added $46,500 to betterments on miles 8, 9, and 10, but not another dollar to any other portion. The total cost of the first 20 miles is therefore $371,500, or slightly more than $18,000 per mile for the completed railroad and its equipment as it stands to-day. It has been in continuous use for eight years, with trains making 20 to 25 miles an hour over this portion of the track, without a single accident.

I have been told by some people who have seen the railroad that surely I must be mistaken—that it could not be built for such an amount. Nevertheless, that is the exact cash cost.

I should say that railroad building in the southern part of Alaska, and from the southern coast northward, need not exceed the cost of like construction in the States by more than 15 per cent, the most of which is for added freight charges by ocean from Seattle or San Francisco to the southern coast of Alaska. There is native timber in abundance for all ordinary construction material, and labor in this part of Alaska is but slightly higher than the scales paid in Washington, Oregon, and California.

It should be borne in mind that with the starting of construction on a Government railroad in Alaska prospectors and miners will go to the country by the thousands. Most of them will work on the railroad at periods for grubstakes to help them in their prospecting. This source of labor supply, in

No doubt 100 years from now, when Alaska is developed and has a population of more millions than she now has thousands, and this railroad needs extensive betterments, with double trackage and including many times the equipment of the initial construction, Mr. FORDNEY'S figures of $76,000 the mile might apply. If the Government does build this road, and it is honestly and efficiently built, I am satisfied it will be illuminating to the people of the United States and to some of the owners of stocks and bonds of railroads who were not on the inside and ground floor when construction of their roads were under way or going on. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] says he is willing to lend money for roads or guarantee bonds for roads, but is not willing to have the Government build them. Oh, no; they would cost too much. We lent the Union Pacific and Central Pacific money enough to build those roads, in addition to giving them land grants, and we gave likewise land grants to the Northern and Southern Pacific. The scandals and frauds perpetrated on the stockholders and the bondholders of those roads, as well as the people, especially in the State of California, is still a stench and a byword. I would ask those gentlemen representing the great State of California if they think California could have fared any worse at the hands of the Government than it did at the hands of the pirates who for years throttled and de-bauched it? True, some of the unholy millions wrested from Government aid and land grants was philanthropically left in your State, yet I question if it was even a molety of your losses by their usurpations and highhanded debauching in county, State, and municipalities. Oh, yes; advance money, guarantee bonds. It does not make any difference if the Guggenheims or the Weyerhausers, the Morgans or the Rockefellers, or the successors to the Stanfords or the Huntingtons, or any other great manipulators of big business, do clean up a few more millions they do not need. Milk the Government first and the people afterwards; it will not do for the Government to go into the railroad business. Why? Because it might lead to Government ownership. If this is going to be such a bad thing for the Government, why stand in the way. You can not experiment any place else so satisfactorily as in Alaska; and if it should prove so calamitous as suggested by some, would not it go a long way toward quieting the cry for Government ownership, and at a comparatively cheap

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] argued that because the engineers who were advised with by the Interior Department regarding the irrigation works of the West under-estimated their cost these railroad estimates are likely to be erroneous. In this connection I desire to say that railroad building is no new thing in this country, while large irrigation works are new. While underestimates on the latter may be excusable, there would be little excuse for mistakes as to railroads. Further than this, if the Government did have to pay more for irrigation construction, the extra cost became a charge against the land reclaimed, which in most all cases was ample security, so no Member need allow the pessimistic view of my friend from Michigan to cloud his perspective with a vision of loss to the Nation.

If the irrigation works cost more than anticipated, we know that the money was expended among many and not turned over to the enrichment of a few, as were the subsidized, bond-guaranteed congressional enactments for private ownership.

Mr. Chairman, we hear a great cry made against the Government going into the railroad business and building a road through its own property, Alaska. The Government built a telegraph line up there, and I have not heard any claims of graft either in its building or operation. If it owns its own telegraph line in Alaska, why not its own railroads?

Some of the gentlemen who will vote and are talking against this bill voted for the Panama Canal. They did not see any danger to the Government in that transaction, which was purely a speculative one. We paid $7,200,000 to Russia for Alaska and have had in return to the United States fiftyfold what we paid for it over and above any expense it has ever been to us.

We paid $10,000,000 to the illegitimate Republic of Panama for a canal concession, and we have put far and beyond $350,000,000 into it, for what? I pause for reply. I suppose that he gentleman from Michigan was willing that the Government of the United States should pay $400,000,000 to build a ditch across the Isthmus of Panama, for what? We have no merchant marine, we have no coastwise fleet, eligible to use the canal. If we ever use the canal we have to create the fleets to float through it. I want to say to you gentlemen who are making the argument against helping Alaska that unscratched Alaska is argument against neiping Alaska that unscratched Alaska is better developed proportionately to-day than is your proud United States merchant thipping to use a canal costing us nearly $400,000,000. It is inconsistent and unwise to help long-suffering Alaska by building some experimental Government railroads, but it was wise, patriotic, and expedient to build the canal on the plea that it was a military necessity. Oh, you canal of the piea that it was a minitary necessity. On, you guardians of the people's interests, they should rise up and call you blessed. Now, I am in favor of the Panama Canal. I think it is wise to have it, even though it will not probably pay as an investment for a hundred years to come, but I do consider that any man who could stand for the Panama Canal and justify that position and oppose construction of this railroad in Alaska is inconsistency personified.

Mr. Chairman, Alaska was purchased from Russia by the United States in 1867 for $7,200,000. The name is derived from the Indian word Al-ay-eska, meaning the great country, and it It contains 590,884 square miles. It was first settled by three Russian priests or saints in 1784 and was in the continuous control of their country until 1867, when it was transferred to the United States. Its chief productions are gold, copper. silver, tin, lead, coal, seals; also salmon, halibut, and other fish. It also has great agricultural and grazing possibilities. Alaska is second only to Colorado in the production of gold. In copper, iron, and coal its possibilities are only to be demonstrated by the development of transportation, but it is well known that all indications point to immense tonnage and great Alaska imported from 1879 to and including 1910: From the United States, $203,566,500 in merchandise; total from other countries, $941,358. It will be seen that less than $1,000,000 of this trade was with other countries. Our investment of $7,200,000 gave us a market for our products amounting, in round numbers, to $204,000,000 in the 31 years, starting with $317,000 in 1879 and amounting to $18,670,339 in 1910.

Since 1904, which was the first year for which the Census Bureau has had available statistics. Alaska has sent into the United States gold as follows: 1904, $6,347,742; 1905, $9,059,023; 1906, $12,638,608; 1907, $18,564,228; 1908, $11,490,777; 1900, $17,782,493; 1910, $18,393,128; a total for the 7 years of $94,-275,999. If this were all the gold we had received from Alaska, it much be sent as a secon it would be a good return on our $7,200,000 investment, but it is only for 7 years, and it is estimated that it is not more than 25 to 30 per cent of the total we have received from that country since we acquired it.

This is only one of the elements of wealth pouring into this country, but probably has been the largest single product in value. I am not going to burden the committee with further figures only to say that the Statistical Abstract of the United States says that in 1908 Alaska furnished $11,536,926 worth of fish and sea-animal products, not including cod and halibut, these two items for some cause being credited to Pacific-coast products, but not segregated as to Alaska. In 1908 there was received $11,500,000 from this source, or $4,000,000 more that one year than we paid for the country in 1867. Alaska has been a great contributor to the wealth of the United States and has received, indeed, but little in return. The United States has never made any other investment that has paid proportionately as this one has, and I verily believe that if we will adopt other than a dog-in-the-manger policy with it it will continue to pay larger returns on the money we will spend there than any other possession or asset we have. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN]

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like now, while I think of it, to ask the privilege of extending my remarks in the

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. Slayden] asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

There was no objection. Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to this debate to-day, as I have on previous days since it began, and I heartily agree with one observation made by my friend from Illinois [Mr. Graham], and that is that a great deal of what he calls "unconscious exaggeration" has been indulged in, and, he adds in a spirit of prudence, "possibly by both sides," in the discussion of this question.

It may be unconscious exaggeration; but few people, I fancy, who have taken the pains to go into the official records will doubt that it is gross exaggeration. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, everything that I have heard said, everything that I have read, in support of this proposition suggests to my mind in a very vivid way that peculiar type of publication which, out in the West, we call "boom literature."

Now, real estate dealers who are undertaking to sell banana plantations in Alaska, or gold mines where minerals do not exist, or town lots in an unbuilt city, may not be deliberately and maliciously falsifying, but it can not be denied by anyone who has ever been in one of these boom communities that when they come to painting pictures that they mean to attract settlers with they do indulge lavishly in high colors.

Now, that is the case, I take it, in this instance. A climate which we know to be frigid, a country which is on and so near A climate the Arctic Circle that one needs nothing more than a knowledge of that general geographical fact to realize it is a cold country-is a place so cold that people who contemplate engaging in agriculture in it should have their sanity investigated-is held up to us as a sort of paradise in prospect. I have gone over a good many of these agricultural reports and I find nothing in them, or substantially nothing—and I do not want to get into that "unconscious exaggeration" referred to by my friend from Illinois [Mr. Graham]-I can find, I say, substantially nothing in them which will encourage any man to believe that it is possible or ever will be possible to develop agriculture in Alaska.

That Alaska has a vast amount of mineral wealth is a matter of very general common knowledge. Even those of us who have never had the good fortune to visit that part of the world know, as we know that Julius Cæsar or Napoleon Bonaparte lived, or any other incident that ever occurred with which we had no personal contact, that in the mountains of that country there is mineral wealth, and because of its peculiar geological formation we are inclined to believe that still greater deposits of mineral wealth will hereafter be found there. But, Mr. Chairman, I was strongly impressed with the reasonableness of the suggestion put forward by my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris]indeed, by my two friends from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris and Mr. DAVENPORT], if I may be permitted to correct myself-that if we want to unlock these treasures in Alaska, all we have to do is to make reasonable laws, the making of which is in our control; provide opportunities to American citizens to go in there and engage in American enterprises for the gain which will come from them.

That is the best inspiration for commercial endeavor. We go into business not for our health, not to develop the commonwealth at all, but to develop personal, individual wealth. Now, make your reasonable leasing laws so that the American business man can have an opportunity of a fair return for invested energy and capital; and if the wealth is there, I have no doubt that they will go, and go fast enough, and that they will build railways—electric railways, steam railways, railways run by the oil that may be there, run by the coal that probably is there-and if the values are there to the extent that my friend from Illinois [Mr. Graham] suggests, in a rather florid flight of fancy, they will even establish, if it be necessary, lines of airships to bring that wealth out. [Laughter and applause.]

There is no obstacle in the way of business success that makes the American business man hesitate. All that he wants to know, all that he requires to know, in order to invest his energy and capital is that there is a reasonable prospect of a return.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. Graham] says that the copper mines in Alaska—the Bonanza mine, I believe, he specifically referred to—has not been doing very well because the coal is "tied up." I use his precise phrase in that instance: "The coal is tied up." Now, my answer to that sort of argument is that if the tying up of the coal has prevented the development of other mining operations in Alaska, then untie the coal, Untie it according to the plan indicated by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] the other day-make a reasonable leas-

Having had a little experience—mostly disastrous—in mining, I was tremendously impressed with what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Graham] said about the great wealth, the almost unparalleled mineral wealth, of those mountains, and I felt for a moment, while I was under the influence of his eloquence, a stir of the old fever which more than once in my life has taken me away from home and comfortable surroundings and carried me to the atmosphere of mining camps, where I have undergone personal discomfort and had associations which. to say the least of them, were not altogether attractive. I felt for a moment, I say, the old fever return, and I wondered if I could wait until that beautiful, balmy springtime to which he looks forward so hopefully in Alaska shall have unlocked the avenues of communication so that I may get up into Alaska.

But I want to say to my friend that copper mines yielding 30 and 40 per cent copper to the ton are very infrequent occurrences on this globe of ours. In the course of my life I have seen bits of gold which ran $50,000, $75,000, $100,000, and $200,000 to the ton, and occasionally they have been made very remunerative, but the circumstances under which they became remunerative were developed when the sharper who had the bit of gold ore running so high in value came in contact with a sucker from the East who was easily taken in by such enterprises. [Applause.] The yield of a gold mine and the yield of a copper mine, permit me to say, is not indicated by these pieces of ore of exceptional value, or by copper returns of 30 or 40 per cent to the ton; and if the gentleman is investing money in copper with the expectation that he is going to get 600 or 800 pounds of merchantable copper from a ton of ore, I am afraid he is heading for a disappointment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to get into the RECORD the statement that there is not a bit of danger of that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman made another statement which I found of unusual interest. I hope I can quote the gen-tleman correctly. He said that Morgan and Guggenheim, or "Morganheim," as the combination had sometimes been called, had offered or suggested that they would build roads and open Alaska if given a "free hand"—now I know I am right in quoting those words "free hand" in the exploitation of that Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. May I correct my friend?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I did not say, or at least certainly did not intend to say, that they had offered or suggested.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think when the gentleman looks at the stenographic report of his speech he will find that he said that, Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I believe they would be willing

Mr. SLAYDEN. I made my note at the time, and I understood the gentleman to say that if they were given a "free hand" in the exploitation of the country they would build the railroads that were needed in Alaska. I would like to have the gentleman tell us when Morgan or Guggenheim, or the amalgam "Morganheim," ever had the audacity to say to the people of this country that they would develop Alaska if they were given a "free hand" to exploit the common property for their per-

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. May I tell the gentleman where he can find much information on the subject?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, I can find lots of information in all directions, but I am asking about this specific information.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. It is all sworn testimony, some of it by the agents of that concern, in the Ballinger inquiry of 1911. These facts were brought out there.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is the gentleman certain that that is not some of the unconscious exaggeration of statement that has characterized the debate, as he says?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I can not speak for the witnesses.

will have time to get in a few paragraphs; but before undertaking that I want to answer a question propounded by my friend from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] as to tonnage for this proposed railroad. When the gentleman was having that rather interesting controversy with the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM] and one or two other gentlemen as to the possible tonnage, I believe it was the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY] who suggested that there might be a tonnage available in hauling in the supplies for these prospectors and The other day I was shown a private letter from a miners. citizen of Seattle, which is the particular place to benefit by this wasteful expenditure of the public money. I was told that the gentleman who wrote it had spent seven years in Alaska; that he was a man of high character, a capable business man, qualified to observe, sufficiently well equipped in a mental way to draw a fair, proper, and reasonable conclusion from the facts which he had observed, and here is what he said. I commend this to the attention of my friend from Virginia.

Mr. BRYAN. Will it be possible to give the name of that gentleman?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I can not, because I got it in a private letter; but I have another letter, and I will give the gentleman the name of the author of that other letter. I can not give the name of the writer of the first one, because it was a private communication and I was not authorized to make it public.

Mr. BRYAN. I understand.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the writer is willing, I shall be glad to He says:

I would suggest that if you are interested in seeing the bill go through, you might point out the possibility of a vast industry that could be created. If the railroad system was broad enough, and horse manure in quantities could be secured, the railroad could spread it all over Alaska about 2 feet thick, which would provide an unlimited inland haul, and then a gigantic mushroom factory could be started and a back haul provided.

[Laughter.]

The fact that there is not a world's market for over 50 per cent of this product need not be pointed out and ought not to cut any figure in an enterprise like this. I can not conceive of anything else that could be grown commercially unless it be lettuce, which would have all of the characteristics of a Virginia creeper. You might put a value on Alaska, and you might possibly induce buyers there, but outside of the fish and the mineral possibilities, practically along the coast only, I would not give 25 cents for the whole damn Territory.

[Laughter.]

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. Is the writer of that letter from Seattle?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. The gentleman does not wish to give his name?

Mr. SLAYDEN. No.
Mr. TAGGART. Is not the gentleman entitled to a Carnegie medal for saving the life of the writer of that letter? [Laugh-

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will read you the other letter that I got yesterday morning addressed to me. From that letter I will now quote:

Everybody out here is jubilant over the Senate having passed the Alaska rallroad bill. Also they are against Government ownership, and condemn Mr. Bryan for his famous Madison Square Garden speech and scoff at the principles he then advocated. No one I have spoken to attempts to reconcile the two positions except to vaguely say "this is different." As a matter of fact, unless one is in favor of Government ownership, he must consider the Alaska bill as a step in the wrong direction. However, like the others, I am selfishly glad of its fine prospect of becoming a law.

There you are, Mr. Chairman. The interest of Seattle in it is explained. The taxpayers of Texas and New York—of the whole country, in fact-foot the bill and Seattle and a few miners get the benefits.

Please note the inconsistency. They were pleased at the passage of the Senate bill, but they are all against Government ownership.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman is going to give the name of the writer of that letter?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not mind giving the gentleman that I have known the writer from boyhood. In fact, he is a first cousin of mine and I vouch for him. If my vouching will do any good, his reputation is established.

Mr. BRYAN. That being the case, would the gentleman-

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have only about four minutes left and I want to lay a predicate for the publication of my real speech.

Mr. Chairman, the peculiar political position in all this matter makes a special appeal to me. If I understand the writings and doctrines of Thomas Jefferson, he held that governments should confine their activities to the preservation of law and order, and should not interfere with the habits or innocent actions of citizens, but should leave them free to regulate their own pursuits. I might elaborate on that with many quotations from the writings of the first great Democratic President, but I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that it will no longer make an appeal, and therefore I shall forbear quoting from the discarded prophet. Samuel J. Tilden, one of the greatest modern, and I begin to fear the last disciple of Thomas Jefferson, said-and I do not pretend to quote his language precisely, but substantially—that the cardinal animating and economic principle of the Democratic Party is that no work shall be done, no func-tion performed by the State that can be as well or better done by the individual, and that the Federal Government should engage in no enterprise that can be as well or better done by the State or individual.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman will be very quick about it. I have only a little time left.
Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I want to suggest whether he does not find in the writings of Thomas Jefferson that he was in favor of the while building roads and carrels? favor of the public building roads and canals?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I think he did. I am not questioning the right of the United States to build things, I am questioning the wisdom of the policy, because I fear it is socialism, and I am a Democrat, not a Socialist.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. But he was in favor of building roads and canals.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That was 100 years ago.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Is it not true that the Military Committee, of which the gentleman is an honored member, have expended $2,000,000 in building wagon roads in Alaska with his approval?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I will have to publish my speech, as I see that I am not going to get an opportunity to read any of it.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The gentleman can answer that question by yes or no.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will answer it as I please in my time. The Committee on Military Affairs has recommended the construction and, under the appropriations which it suggested in this House, has built a good many miles of trails and roads in Alaska. Just what they have cost I do not know. ought to do it. It was a military matter, a military necessity, and no one questions the right of the Government to do that. But I will say to the gentleman that honest, capable men, as familiar with the conditions in Alaska as he or anyone is, not influenced by the hope of political or personal gain, say that it is immeasurably better for the people in Alaska, immeasurably better for the future development of that country, that trails should be built through Alaska in order that the people may get in and out, and that they are needed infinitely more than are railroads. [Applause.]

Never in the history of business in this country has capital lacked enterprise or the disposition to engage itself, where there appeared any hope or reasonable expectation of even a moderate return for the risk assumed. On the contrary, it has sometimes been charged against our business men that they lacked the conservatism of their fellows in Europe; that, in fact, they had a little too much of the gambler's spirit. If they have refused to prosecute business enterprises in Alaska, it may be accepted as a fact that conditions there are not promising. It may also be accepted as a fact that where men of business can not see a profit in commercial enterprises only disaster can follow the efforts of Government in that particular field.

The business organizations of the Government are never conducted with the same careful scrutiny of the expense account; their wage scales are always higher, except in the more impor-tant technical and scientific places, hours shorter, and the control less exacting. In fact—and this is notorious—the Government can not compete in skill and economy in business organization or business management with individuals or private corporations. It is an axiom that whatever the Government does, unless executed without regard to cost, is less well and more expensively done than when conducted by individuals or private corporations.

In the building of railways there is the widest possible opportunity for waste and extravagance, and such opportunities are rarely, if ever, overlooked by the agents of Government.

Conditions in Alaska are such as to make it certain that the maximum of cost in every enterprise will be reached. Half of each year must be spent in comparative idleness. The climate compels it, for an act of Congress can not repeal the laws of nature. The thermometer usually goes down so far below zero that work can not be done from November to April.

We are advised that the minimum pay of the most ordinary labor is $3 a day, and even at that price the laborer's life is not attractive and his savings can not possibly put him on the list of income-tax pavers

I can not think of any country where the conditions are so certain to entail the maximum cost of any undertaking.

As a business investment of the taxpayers' money the construction of a railway in Alaska appeals to me as the extreme of folly. If it were not so, private capital would long ago have found a way to unlock the supposed treasures of that country.

It is contended, Mr. Chairman, that this appropriation is necessary to open Alaska to the people of the United States and to develop the country. Alaska is a very large part of the earth's surface, and if it is intended to develop it by building railways to the various sections of that country which will be asked for by the few and widely scattered settlers, the American people will be in for an expenditure which will make the Panama Canal, to this time our largest investment, look like a trifle from a bargain counter. Thirty-five million dollars will not do it, nor three hundred and fifty million dollars. For years we will be sending good money after bad, and will finally wake up to the fact that we have wasted half a billion dollars from the people's contributions to the Government.

Mr. Chairman, it is well to consider the advice of the people who know about conditions in Alaska and who have no interest whatever in coal mines, gold mines, or the mythical meadows that have been dangled before our eyes for a month or more.

The Board of Road Commissioners for Alaska, created by an act of Congress approved January 27, 1905, which consists of Army officers, whose only interest in Alaska is to do the work assigned them and submit the facts to Congress, in the report for 1913 say:

report for 1913 say:

Our board specifically disavows any intent to set forth views in opposition or discouragement to railroad construction in the Territory under proper limitations, but after several years of careful observation and study of the land-transportation conditions and of the natural inducements to development and to settlement which exist, is convinced that no rapid or general development will follow the construction of trunk lines of railroad to the interior unless preceded or accompanied by the construction of numerous wagon roads and trails as feeders, and even then the development will be slow.

In making this statement our board may incur the suspicion of wishing to give undue importance to its own work, but the railroad commission itself recognized this fact, and no one acquainted with the true situation can fail to do likewise.

Unlike the great West in another respect, Alaska has a wonderful system of waterways, both coastal and interior, and while the interior system is open only about five months of the year, during this open period supplies can be distributed to almost every part of the Territory by means of its various ramifications.

There are about 475 miles of railways already constructed

There are about 475 miles of railways already constructed in Alaska, of which only 356 miles are now being operated for the carriage of freight and passengers. And these, I am told, are not overprosperous. Surely the other mileage was not constructed without the belief that tonnage would be offered in quantities to justify the cost of construction. Somebody was Some capitalists spent money to build railways to make more money and the investment has not been a good one, and I suspect that some of them want to unload on the people. Now, if business men, alert to make dividends and much more capable in the discernment of these opportunities than any mere salaried agent of the Government will ever be, make such mistakes, who can believe that this will be a profitable enterprise for the taxpayers? Who can think that Congress will make money where keen, practical business men have failed?

The total value of Alaskan production from 1868 to 1911, as sublished, is $429,523,630, of which the coastal region gave $337,386,352, or more than 75 per cent. Fifty per cent of this great wealth came from the fisheries, which, of course, are on the seacoast, where railways are not really needed and would be of little value if built. Outside of the gold production, which has been and can be handled without a railway, the yield from the interior of Alaska is negligible and certainly does not justify this revolutionary move and enormous outlay.

Much stress has been laid on the coal deposits of Alaska, which are, no doubt, of very great potential value and ultimately will become an active asset of the American people. It has been claimed that the coal is needed for the Navy. But the tests made at the engineering experiment station, Annapolis, Md., show that it is unsuited for naval purposes. The Assistant Secretary of the Navy so stated in his letter to Mr. DAVENPORT, written December 27 last.

But, Mr. Chairman, the great and at this time the only desirable fuel for the Navy is oil. The nature of this admittedly superior fuel is having an influence on naval construction. It is driving Governments to the purchase of oil fields and has even provoked international correspondence and ill feeling. country which occupies a position of advantage with reference to the supply of fuel oil is envied by other Governments not so fortunate. Our country is blessed in that respect. In California, Texas, Louisiana, Oklahoma, and other States we have extensive oil fields, the product of which can be purchased or, if need be, condemned by the Federal Government

The cry that we need Alaskan coal for the Navy is ill timed or insincere. Experiments by scientific officers of the Government have demonstrated its inefficiency. In the letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Navy to Mr. Davenport, of Oklahoma, the statement is plainly made that it is unsuitable for the purposes of the Navy. It is less valuable for steaming by 25 per cent than the West Virginia coal. So that argument

A STEP TOWARD SOCIALISM.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to all forms of socialism. I believe in the greatest possible liberty of action for the individual and the narrowest possible field of activity for the Government.

When government provides equal opportunities under the law for all citizens and punishes transgressions on the rights of person and property of any citizen by another it has, in my humble democratic judgment, done all, or substantially all, it should do. That may be old-fashioned, but it is my faith, and I shall stand by it. I can not do otherwise and be true to the principles and traditions of my party or retain my self-respect.

This is the beginning on a large scale of Government ownership of railways. The situation at Panama is exceptional. That railway was bought and has been maintained as an adjunct of the canal work-a mere tool used in construction. If it is not necessary to keep it as a part of the machinery of the canal, I hope it will be sold and that the Federal Government will go entirely out of the railway business as quickly as possible.

I think it would be a serious blunder for this Government to go into the transportation business. It would mean an ultimate extension of the roll of public servants to such a degree that they would make a resistless body of compact, organized officials, with an unsatisfied and unsatisfiable appetite for larger pay, shorter hours, and pensions. If, as happened in France, they went on a strike, we would be confronted with rebellion as much more serious than the French situation as our railway mileage exceeds that of France. The French Government settled the strike by calling all reserves to the colors, and the habit of soldlering, persevered in for generations, caused the strikers to rally to the support of government. Could we handle such a situation in that way? I do not believe we could.

Our railway corporations complain now that on account of increased wages and the high cost of material they can not earn enough to pay dividends to the owners of the property. Shippers protest against an increase of rates which the roads say they must have to keep out of the bankruptcy court. If private corporations can not earn on the basis of existing rates, it is absolutely certain that the Government could not, and that year by year the deficit would be made up out of the Federal Treasury.

I have traveled on a good many government-owned roads, and on none of them have I seen a service equal to that we have in this country. The equipment of the trains in this country is superior and the speed greater, and, quality of service considered, our ordinary passenger fare is less, as a rule, than the second-class rates on the Continent of Europe.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the reports of departmental experts show most conclusively that the talk of the development agriculture in Alaska is preposterous. I will submit and print in the RECORD a few citations from these reports, as well as an excerpt or two from the Senate hearings.

On pages 548, 550, 552, and 556 Prof. Charles V. Piper says:

On pages 548, 550, 552, and 556 Prof. Charles V. Piper says:

So far as rallways into the interior are concerned, any great amount of agricultural freight in the future would have in the main to come from and on account of possible grain production—that is, the production of other things like dairy products, or even meats—would not yield any very great amount of freight.

The most interesting experiment stations, so far as this problem is concerned in Alaska, are those at Rampart, which has been conducted since about 1900; Fairbanks, where the experiment station has been in existence since 1907, I believe; and Copper Center, on the Copper River, where an experiment station was conducted from 1902 to 1906. At the first two of these interior stations—Rampart and Fairbanks—spring-sown oats and spring-sown barley have yielded good crops practically every year they have been tested. Fail-sown rye and fail-sown wheat mature, but there is usually considerable winter killing, especially in the wheat, due to too thin snow protection from the severe cold. At both of these stations a large amount of time has been spent in the endeavor to breed up hardier varieties of all these grains better suited to the conditions in Alaska. There can be little doubt that varieties of these cereals will be developed better adapted to the region than any we now possess. However, among the numerous varieties tested, a good many varieties of oats and barley have succeeded, as I have stated. The ryes have done very well, and some fall-sown wheats have given very good results. Spring-sown wheats, I think, in no case have matured. At Copper Center the results have not been as favorable. During the six years that the station was conducted spring-sown grains—that is, oats and barley—matured perfectly only one season.

Crops that mature perfectly in only one season out of six will neither reduce the cost of living nor make the farmers

This extract from the testimony of Mr. MacKenzle and Prof. Piper is illuminating as to conditions in Alaska. Particular attention is invited to the statement of the latter that the pioneer is "attracted to public land that he can homestead, even if it cost $200 an acre to clear." Better land, in a good climate, on railways, and near markets are not so attractive to him as the appearance of getting public lands at a song, or for nothing.

on railways, and near markets are not so attractive to him as the appearance of getting public lands at a song, or for nothing.

Senator Jones. What is your estimate, Judge, of the cost of clearing land at Fairbanks?

Mr. Wickersham. It does not cost much. Do you know, Mr. Joslin, what they figure on down there?

Mr. Joslin. The report of the farmer for the experiment station for 1911 showed $200 an acre.

Mr. Wickersham. That was up there in that heavy timber?

Mr. Joslin. Yes; up in that heavy timber.

Prof. Piper. That was also about the cost at Kenai on lands covered with light timber.

Mr. Ballaine. That is heavy timber—very heavy timber at Kenai. Prof. Piper. I would not call it very heavy.

Mr. MacKerzie. I have had a little experience in clearing land up in the listerior of Alaska, and if you can get a burn on the ground and kill those trees, the roots will lie on top of the frost, and in two or three years you can go along there and almost kick them out. It is very easy. Of course, if you do it in one season, it is a very expensive system.

Prof. Piper. At any rate, whether you put it at $100 an acre or $50 an acre, you can still get good farm lands in the United States at $50 an acre. However, I would not give too much weight to that, because the pioneer is attracted to public land that he can homestead even if it cost $200 an acre to clear. The $200 an acre for clearing it is based, I suppose, on wages to the ordinary laboring man of $5 and $6 a day, and if a farmer clears the land himself he saves that $5 or $6 a day. So that it is really the high cost of labor that makes the apparent high cost of clearing that land.

Mr. Chubbuck, on the basis of his reconnoissance in Alaska, has given expression to conservative views regarding the future possibilities of grain raising in the interior of Alaska very much, I think, like the ideas I have presented.

Senator Walsh. Who is Mr. Chubbuck?

Prof. Piper. Mr. Chubbuck is a member of the Bureau of Plant Industry, and spent the years 1909 and 1910 making an a

In another part of his testimony Prof. Piper said that if the railway were built plenty of "literature of the boom type" would be published to lure the hopeful and ignorant from better conditions at home to the hardships and disappointments of

I will quote his testimony as given in the Senate hearings:

I will quote his testimony as given in the Senate hearings:

Prof Piper. I may state briefly, in conclusion, that my own viewpoint, and I think that is the viewpoint Prof. Chubbuck has taken—and I am sure it is the one Prof. Georgeson takes in all his reports—is conservative as to the future agricultural development of the interior of Alaska. I have no doubt that with the building of the rall-ways there will be plenty of literature of the boom type published, but I think it would be something of a calamity to induce any large number of homesteaders to go there to morrow with the idea that it could be developed rapidly like much of our prairie country was in the West. In the development of a new agricultural region usually the first development is live stock and the second is grain raising—usually wheat raising. Now, in the development of the live-stock industry in Alaska somewhat different methods will have to be used to those which farmers have been familiar with in the States, and in a way they will have to feel their way along toward the most profitable methods.

In the matter of extensive grain culture, while that may be possible, I feel that the farmer himself will have many problems to solve before the ordinary man can be advised to go into grain farming. That is, in other words, I would fear that the greatest danger to the proper development of the Interior of Alaska would be of holding out to roseate hopes of what can be done in the way of its agricultural development.

Here is what Mr. Boyce, of Chicago, I believe a newspaper publisher, has to say about agriculture in Alaska:

FARMING IN ALASKA.

TILLING THE SOIL OVER PROST.

"Gold is where it is found," is an old and true saying. Finding it does not, however, depend on climate, soil, elevation, or favorable natural conditions. This is not true of farming. Agricultural products require congenial surroundings, although through the development of seed and intelligent handling of soil and crop we are now growing grains, fruits, and vegetables in many parts of the world heretofore unthought of. Man can not eat gold, timber, or coal. He must have foodstuff, plenty of it, and cheap.

Before I went to Alaska I knew about the gold and fishing and furs and shooting, but was ignorant as to the agricultural possibilities and products. After covering thousands of miles and seeing nearly every developed spot where anything that grows to eat is at its best, I am satisfied that it is a poor country for a farmer, and always will be. Should you succeed in getting a small patch cleared up at a place where there was a "loom on" you could get fancy prices for one or two years until the boom was over. Except for the long summers and nightless days in Alaska, it would be impossible to grow anything. No warmth comes from the soil or beneath the surface. As far down as a shaft has ever been sunk, over 2,000 feet, you find ice. This ice was not made by freezing from the top down. For millions of years the country has been built up from the bottom, ice on ice that never thawed out in the summer. The moss that grows nearly everywhere is a complete protection from the sun, and when you sink a pick through it you think you have struck rock. Clear off this moss, other vegetation, or scrub timber, and you have the frozen earth. The sun will draw out the ice and frost about 1 foot the first year. Break this up and the next year it thaws out deeper, until after a number of years the frost, on account of the long days, will disappear by June 1 down 2 or 3 feet.

Where alfalfa has been tried it turns yellow as soon as the roots strike the ice. Of course, with the frost always coming out of the ground you can raise crops where you have only a few inches of rainfall in the summer. Interior and northwest Alaska is very dry in the summer. Only where the Japan current comes close to the southeast coast and the islands do you have much rain.

In Norway, Sweden, Finland, and Russlan Siberia farming has been fairly successful in a latitude as far north as most of Alaska, and this has given hope to the wish that we might make an agricultural country out of our far-north possession. For many centuries these countries have been thickly settled, and labor has been very cheap. An acre could be cleared for little cost, but that is not the case in Alaska, where common labor, employed only for a few months in the year, receives from $3 to $6 per day of eight hours. It costs from $125 to $150 to prepare an acre for the plow. You have invested the total cost per acre of first-class farm land near a good market in an old country before you begin raising anything to sell in this dayless-night and nightless-day region.

What Mr. Boyce has to say about the impossibility of serving the 32,000 people in Alaska, except at a cost so staggering that all prudent men revolt at the suggestion, is marked by such common sense and frankness that I will also quote it:

ALASKA'S RAILROADS.

ALASKA'S RAILEOADS.

PRESENT AND FUTURE POLICIES.

Alaska, like all new countries, has her share of boomers and failures. The failures and Government employees all want the Government to spend a lot of money in Alaska building railroads, wagon roads, bridges, and winter trails, and in dredging harbors, etc. In fact, I heard it suggested that if Canada would permit, it would be a good scheme to pump the Japan Current into the source of the Yukon River, and from thence let it flow west down that stream, making a perpetual warm country out of the Valley of the Yukon.

This, of course, was objected to by the Alaskans living on the Pacific waters, as it would favor the Yukon valley and Bering Sea, and leave their part of the country frozen 8 months out of the 12. So you see how impossible it is to please or serve more than 3,000 or 4,000 people in Alaska at less than a cost of several billion dollars without disappointing the other 28,000.

Serlously speaking, the 32,000 white people in Alaska are scattered over a territory one-fifth the size of the United States. The winters except for a small strip of country along the southeast coast—affected by the warm Japan Current—extend over eight months of the year. Nevertheless, Alaska is a wonderful country in many ways, and I have never met with a braver, stronger lot of men—two-thirds of the population are men—any place in the world. They come from everywhere, but especially from the Pacific coast and gold-producing States; some from Australia, Canada, and the cold countries of Europe.

Keep in mind all the time, however, that it is over 1,500 miles from Ketchikan, the southeast corner of Alaska, to Cape Prince of Wales, on Bering Strait, northwest of Nome. And, again, it is over 1,500 miles from Unalaska and Dutch Harbor, in the southwest corner of Wales, on Bering Strait, northwest of Nome. And, again, it is over 1,500 miles from Unalaska is not equal to a country 1,500 miles square, it is just as difficult to serve from a transportation standpoint, and nearly all of

As an alternative, the suggestion of Mr. Boyce that it will be cheaper to pension all the people of Alaska at the rate of $1,500 a year offers the less expensive way of meeting the demands of these hungry folks, and if they had that income out of the Common Treasury they could live in Seattle and spend it there and perhaps also satisfy that city, which appears to be behind this absurd measure.

Mr. Chairman, reasons might be multiplied indefinitely to show why this bill should not pass, but they have been so fully and ably set out by the two gentlemen from Oklahoma and others that I will not consume any more time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to address myself especially to the argument made against this bill based upon the idea that it commits the Government as a general proposition to the public ownership of railroads wherever located, railroads already in existence and operation, like the Pennsylvania, the Baltimore & Ohio, and like railroads. I do not accept any such proposition. My genial friend from North Carolina [Mr. Small], in answer to a direct inquiry, said that he did regard the passage of this bill as committing the Government to the policy of general railroad ownership. I do not think so, and I want to show you why I do not think it does. We have done many such things in the past.

What is transportation? It is moving persons or property from one point to another. Is not that true? It is moving persons and property from one State to another or from one nation to another. Every highway in the country, every dirt road, is a transportation facility; it is a means of transportation of persons and property.

Now, we have private dirt roads operated and owned by gentlemen on their farms, but all common highways are owned by the community, by the State, or by the country; they perform a public function; they are public facilities and owned by the people. Does that commit anybody irrevocably to the policy that the Government should own every other means of transportation of persons and property?

Why, it will not do to claim that the owning of a special means of transportation for a special purpose will have such relation to the general proposition as to commit us to Government ownership of railroads in general.

The Government owns this District. It owns this Capitol. When this Capitol was built elevators had not come into use, so stair steps were built all around and in it. Afterwards elevators came into use. An elevator is a means of transportation of persons from one portion of a building to another; it is a facility of transportation. The Government owned this building, and was it committed to the transportation of persons and property in general because it built an elevator in its own building? The Washington Monument was built by the Government, and is 555 feet high, with circular stair steps for ascen-When elevators came into use the Government, owning the Monument and the grounds upon which it stood, built an elevator for passengers to go up and down in the Monument, thereby performing the service of transportation in the Monu-

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.
Mr. HARDY. I want to say to the gentleman that our State gave 16 sections, 12,000 acres, to get other people to build the roads, and in that way escaped Government ownership. Would the gentleman prefer that process to owning the road after they have given that amount to build it?

Mr. SIMS. That is for the gentleman from Texas to state after they lost the land. I am not discussing the merits of public ownership. I am only trying to point out that the passage of this bill does not commit anyone to the policy of the Government owning railroads, any more than did the building of an elevator in the Capitol Building or putting one into the Washington Monument.

A few years ago I introduced a bill, which I think was reported to the House and passed the House, to build a spur track from the Pennsylvania Railroad to the navy yard. lovable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] opposed it bitterly upon the idea that it committed the Government to the policy of Government ownership of railroads. It was to be about 1,000 feet in length, and to be built as a special plant facility. The Government owned the navy yard, and it seemed to me that it might own a track to connect with the Pennsylvania Railroad, and that any other road should have the right to build a connection with the track and use it on the same

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Is it not a fact that in that matter it was stated it would not pay the Pennsylvania Co. to build that spur, and it was a very expensive operation for the Government?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, it is not the question of what the Pennsylvania Railroad had to say about it. What I am talking about is the fact of the gentleman having made a serious argument that to do such a thing committed the United States Government to the policy of the ownership of all railroads.

Mr. MOORE. Yes; I did make that argument. Mr. SIMS. Yes; which was about of the force of the argument in this case in opposition to this bill, based on the same objection, according to my honest opinion. What is Alaska? It is a Government-owned piece of land. I do not care whether it is good farming land or not. The question is, Are all of its resources, agricultural, mineral, and everything else combined, worth developing? Will Alaska, with a railroad be worth the price of the railroad more than it is now? If so, where is the principle that denies us not only the power but the wisdom of the policy of building an elevator, as it were, into Alaska? I am leaving all questions as to the productions and resources of Alaska and what it will be worth to the United States to the committee that have investigated it. My two good friends, Mr. FERRIS and Mr. DAVENPORT, have each made speeches here. I did not hear all of the speech of Mr. DAVENPORT, but I did hear all of his colleague's [Mr. FERRIS], and I never heard a better or abler speech in this House on any subject. [Applause.] I give to him and all others the right to exercise their own judgment as they may see fit, without any thought of impugning anyone's motives; but my theory is that here is a piece of land and it is not worth to the people of this country, who own it, as much without a railroad as it will be with a railroad, and that Philippine Government.

by the Government owning the railroad it can prevent the evils of private monopolistic ownership of the resources of Alaska that may grow out of private ownership. I do not care whether the road, as an investment, pays or not. I do not care whether, regarding it as an independent enterprise, the freight and passenger traffic maintains it; but if opening up the whole of Alaska, being Government-owned property, is benefited to the extent of the value of the railroad and its maintenance, then it is good business to do it, is it not? We afford by this railroad the means of developing whatever is there, and if there is not anything worth developing let us sell the Territory as quickly as we can. If we are going to develop it, let us treat it like a private individual would treat his own private property-make the best of it, and furnish the facilities necessary to make the best of it. Would a man having a forest at the back of his farm, with a swamp in front of it, stand back and refuse to build a road to his timber that could not otherwise be developed?

The timber is worth nothing as it stands, but it would be worth a great deal with the road constructed, although the road itself might be merely an expense. My friends ought to remember for a moment that there is nothing new in the ownership of a mere plant facility, and that is all this railroad will be. Alaska is a great Territory. This is a mere branch line connecting the interior of Alaska with the ocean, like the line from the navy yard up to the Pennsylvania Railroad. It is a mere connecting link that private enterprise will not build without all of the benefits that accrue to private enterprise. We have a Government-owned railroad at Panama, and have had it for a number of years. It has not only been operated to perform service for the Government, but it is performing service for the public. It has carried freight, many millions of dollars worth, across the Isthmus for others than the Government. That railroad has been rebuilt, every mile of it, at an enormous expense, and why? We have just dug at the expense of approximately $400,000,000, a canal, another transportation facility, and one in which the benefits of transportation will accrue more to the world at large than to the United States. Why have we relocated and constructed a new railroad at an immense cost right along by the side of that canal? Is it to compete with the canal, the Government owning both? Not at all. land transportation facility, built right alongside of a water transportation facility as an aid to the water transportation facility, a mere equipment for maintenance purposes, and to be used in case of accident to the canal.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. And then there is the further fact that we own three or four large ships that sail the ocean in connection with this same proposition.

Mr. SIMS. That is true; but that is a temporary ownership, as I understand, while the railroad is permament. The point I am making is not the Government ownership of the railroad at Panama for general transportation purposes, but as a mere facility to enable the Government to operate its waterway. That does not commit the Government to the public ownership of railroads any more than if there was no railroad there.

What have we done in the Philippines? I tried to see some member of the Committee on Insular Affairs to ascertain whether or not my information was correct, but was unable to do so; but I am advised that because of the difficulty of constructing railroads in the Philippines, necessary for their development, the Government of the Philippines and the Government of the United States guaranteed the bonds of the railroad.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the facts are that the bonds were authorized by the United States Congress, but they were issued by the Philippine Government, which is responsible for the payment of the interest only, and there is a deficiency in the operation now.

Mr. SIMS. But the United States Government is responsible? Mr. MOORE. Not directly responsible; only moraly. Mr. COX. We guaranteed the interest.

Mr. MOORE. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. The Philippine Government is responsible for the interest.

Mr. SIMS. Does the Philippine Government own the railroad?

Mr. MOORE. No; Congress authorized the Philippine Government to authorize contracts for the construction of railroads. The railroads have been built under contract, and the contractors or the railroads have undertaken to operate and pay the interest on the bonds.

Mr. SIMS. Are the railroads owned by private corporations? Mr. MOORE. They are owned by corporations and the bonds are guaranteed to the extent of the payment of interest by the

Mr. SIMS. And the Government of the United States as to all of them?

Mr. MOORE. The Government of the United States is not responsible, except morally.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? The gentleman is a member of the Com-Mr. SIMS. Yes. mittee on Insular Affairs.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the situation with reference to the Philippine railroad is this: Congress passed an act authorizing the Philippine Government to enter into contracts for the construction of railways and to guarantee-that is, the Philippine Government-4 per cent on the railroad bonds. Mr. SIMS. Is the Government of the United States responsible for those bonds?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The Government of the United States is not responsible for those bonds. I would not concede that under any circumstances.

Mr. SIMS. But the Philippine Government is? That is what wanted to know.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The Philippine Government is responsible.

For both bonds and interest?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Four per cent for 30 years. Mr. SIMS. I was not sure that I had the facts; but if the Philippine Government had not done what it did and the United States Government had not done what it did there would have been no railroads built in the Philippines. I am only trying to point out that we should not fail to develop a territory we own because some men, forsooth, may say that it binds us or commits us to the policy of general Government ownership of railroads.

So far as my section of our country is concerned, and that is all I know much about, the majority of our people are opposed to the Government ownership of railroads. They have always been and they are still opposed to it, so far as I am informed.

Now, the mere favoring of these things, the mere advocacy of Government ownership as a matter of theory and academic policy, will never bring it, and the passage of a thousand bills like this will not bring it, and the defeat of a thousand like this will not prevent it.

Will the gentleman yield right there? Mr. FERRIS.

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Now, if we build this railroad along the lines of this bill and issue the bonds and make the appropriation in Alaska, what will you be heard to say when 300,000 Indians come, as wards of the Government, and state that their lands are underlain with coal and that a railroad will develop their resources? I ask you if this is not setting a precedent that will make it extremely hard for you or anybody else to turn them

Mr. SIMS. I believe the gentleman is a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. FERRIS. Not now, but I have been.

Mr. SIMS. I thought you were. I am sorry for the committee if you are not. When it comes from the committee with a favorable report, with information from the Committee on Indian Affairs, I will act with reference to the merits of that single proposition without reference to the policy of the country upon any other measure that may follow it just as I am acting on this bill.

Defeat this bill and you will keep Alaska where it has been for many years. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. McKellar] has a bill to cut down the period of cold storage of food products. Alaska's products have been in cold storage for thousands of years. Is it not time to open up and let the people of the

Mr. DAVENPORT. I want to suggest to the gentleman that Alaska's products have been in cold storage since the beginning

Mr. SIMS. This bill provides facilities for making accessible hundreds of millions of dollars in value of products which have existed since the beginning of time.

Mr. MANN. I think they have been there long enough.

Mr. SIMS. So do I think.

Now, my friend from Texas [Mr. Slayden] who has just taken his seat talked about overadvertising. I went to Texas once and stopped in his good town. I had read the advertisements of southwest Texas, and I went all the way from Tennessee to San Antonio to see for myself. And I want to say right now that, so far as I could see, it had not been overadvertised; it, in fact, had been underadvertised. It was beautiful beyond description. Birds of paradise were flitting through the air [laughter] and flowers were everywhere. It is a beautiful and glorious land.

About 5 or 6 o'clock in the afternoon I saw 15 or 20 young gentlemen and ladies passing out of the plaza on ponies at a swift gallop. Such personal liberty in the middle of a town I never saw before, and I admired those who were exercising it. The only thing I saw that had been overadvertised was the San Pedro Springs, but perhaps I am wrong even about that. They had been advertised as beautiful springs, and they were beautiful. I was hot, tired, and thirsty, and in the old-fashioned way I lay down and drew up a mouthful of water. It went back immediately. It was hot. [Laughter.] It was not boiling water, but as I expected it would be cold from the way it looked, and from the way it had been advertised, it possibly appeared much warmer than it really was.

But that part of Texas had not been overadvertised, so far as description of its beauties was concerned.

I do not know whether Alaska has been overadvertised or not. I am leaving all that to the committee.

As a number of gentlemen who have taken part in this debate have expressed fears that the passage of this bill will commit Congress to the policy of Government ownership of railroads in general, I think it will not be out of place to discuss for a short time some things that may result in forcing Government ownership of railroads in some form on the country, possibly before it is prepared to undertake so great and so tremendous a responsibility upon itself.

Mr. Chairman, I have always advocated the regulation of railroads and have always opposed Government ownership and operation. I have for years believed that one or the other Either the Government must fully and effectively must prevail. control the railroads, so as to give the whole country and every part of it the best possible service under private ownership, or it must own and operate them in the general public interest.

With the hope that regulation was feasible and possible, I have believed that with broad, general powers conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, with the very best and ablest men that the country affords as members of that commission, that Government ownership might be rendered un-necessary. I have hoped that the owners and operators of our railroads would prefer private ownership with public regulation and supervision rather than public ownership. But I am not so hopeful of the cooperation of the railroads as I have been heretofore. It seems that it is the policy of the railroads to treat every act of Congress looking to regulation and control as a criminal statute-to be obeyed only after every legal test of the validity of the law has been resorted to through all the courts of the country. The lower Federal courts seem to construe such acts of Congress with great strictness, so as to narrow the remedial features of all such legislation, often holding acts and parts of acts invalid, and thus making it necessary to have every doubtful point as to the validity of a statute passed on by the Supreme Court of the United States before even a grudging obedience is had on the part of the common carriers.

Since the acts of 1906 and 1910 were passed, increasing the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, it has performed the greatest possible public service, and at this time there is no branch of the Government in which the people have greater and more implicit confidence than in the Interstate Commerce Commission. To this day that commission has never in all its years of useful service made one single order affecting the rates and practices of the railroads that has been held confiscatory by any court, high or low. But notwithstanding this record of the commission, nearly every one of its important orders is attacked in the courts by the carriers and fought to the bitter end. Mr. Chairman, if the common carriers would only cooperate with the commission and give aid and advice in the almost impossible task that the commission must perform, my hope for successful and satisfactory regulation and control of the railroads would be greatly strengthened; or if the inferior Federal courts would only give the acts of Congress a broad and liberal construction, so as to reach the end Congress evidently intended to reach in its efforts at regulation and control, that would give additional grounds for hope of success with private ownership.

Under present conditions, Mr. Chairman, it is no longer a question of how to bring about Government ownership of railroads, but the real, burning question for our present consideration is, What can we do to prevent it?

I do not believe there are a great number of our people who really desire that the Government shall assume the ownership and operation of the railroads of our country. They have been and will continue to be patient as long as there is a peg on which to hang a hope. The people are slow to anger, but when once aroused they never quit the fight until victory perches on their banner.

The owners of railroads have many real difficulties to face and overcome in which they need and will have the considerate sympathy of every fair-minded man and woman in our country, and if they will only convince the people that they will in the future so conduct their business as to give the best possible service for the lowest possible charge Government ownership can be avoided; but the people are in no temper to submit to further exploitation schemes on the part of railroad owners and operators. A mere promise to be good will not be sufficient.

Mr. Chairman, we have 48 States possessed with absolute sovereign power over the regulation and control of railroad rates and practices as to all business of a purely intrastate character, although done by an interstate carrier. So far as I have been able to look up the decisions of the courts, there can be no question as to the correctness of this statement. So Congress is without power to in any way interfere with State regulation and control of all purely intrastate business. Each of the 48 States may have differing laws and regulations as to the field in which it has jurisdiction. So one interstate railroad may do some intrastate business in 20 or more States, in each of which it must comply with the laws and regulations of these States and State commissions, regardless of the cost and expenses incurred, so long as the State law is not void under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

In addition to being subject to all the valid laws and regulations of the 48 States, or so many of same as the railroad in question may enter, all railroads doing an interstate business are subject to all valid laws of Congress and all valid rules and regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to all interstate business. The value of the interstate business of our railroads is many times greater than the intrastate business; but in fixing and adjusting rates and charges both sources of revenue must necessarily be considered. So, Mr. Chairman, even if the railroads cooperate with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in all good faith attempt to live up to and abide by all valid State laws and regulations, rate making will remain a complex and difficult thing to do so as to give a fair, full, just, nondiscriminating service to all sections of the coun-

The recent case heard by the Supreme Court of the United States, commonly called the Shreveport case, involving an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission as to a discrimination alleged to have been made by interstate carriers against Shreveport, La., and in favor of Dallas and Houston, Tex., raises a very interesting question as to the conflicting powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the powers several States and State commissions, which, when finally decided by the Supreme Court, may have a very great effect on the exercise of the power of Congress through the Interstate Commerce Commission to successfully prevent rate discriminations by interstate carriers, as between localities, although brought about in obedience to the order of a State commission, made within its powers as conferred by the valid laws of a sovereign State as to intrastate commerce.

Mr. Chairman, it will be interesting and enlightening to give a few extracts from the report of the majority of the commission in that case, as also the position taken by the Texas com-mission, and the legal questions arising out of the complicated and opposing interests involved.

Commissioner Lane, speaking for a majority of the Interstate Commerce Commission, in part says:

"This proceeding places in issue the right of interstate carriers to discriminate in favor of State traffic and against interstate traffic. The gravamen of the complaint is that the carriers defendant make rates out of Dallas and other Texas points into eastern Texas which are much lower than those which they extend into Texas from Shreveport, La. A rate of 60 cents carries first-class traffic to the eastward from Dallas a distance of 160 miles, while the same rate of 60 cents will carry the same class of traffic but 55 miles into Texas from Shreveport.

The railroad commission of Louisiana has brought this proceeding under direction of the legislature of that State for two purposes: (1) To secure an adjustment of rates that will be just and reasonable from Shreveport into Texas, and (2) to end, if possible, the alleged unjust discrimination practiced by these interstate railroads in favor of Texas State traffic and against similar traffic between Louisiana and Texas.

"There appears to be little question as to the policy of the Texas commission. It is frankly one of protection to its own industries and communities. We find in the early reports of that commission, which are quoted at length in the record, evidences that the Texas commission believed that the interstate carriers operating from the north and the east into Texas were pursuing a policy hostile to the development of that State. The Texas commission was conscious that it was within the power of these interstate carriers to so adjust rates as to make Texas entirely or largely dependent upon other States and thus restrict the growth of her cities and fix the nature of her industries, the employments of her people, and the character of her civilization so far as these depend on economic and industrial conditions. With this thought in mind the Texas commission sought to establish a Texas policy and to make the railroads within that State contribute in the manner believed by her own people to best subserve their own interests. Accordingly we find in the fifth annual report of that commission (p. 5) the following:

"'To Texas as a whole it is of the most vital concern that there should be within her limits at proper places jobbing and manufacturing establishments. Besides adding to the citizenship of the State a desirable population and furnishing employment to persons already in our midst and enhancing the taxable values of the State, and, as a consequence, under wisely administered government, aiding in ultimately reducing the rate of taxation, and besides the home market they afford to the tiller of the soil and other producers, including manufacturers, for their products, if men, in Texas, having the capital to engage in a wholesale business or in a manufacturing enterprise, for the success of which natural conditions are favorable, they have as much right to invest their means in such business or enterprise as a man in Illinois or Missouri has to embark in such business or enterprise in his State. Some of the Texas lines of railway, constituting parts of interstate systems of railway interested in long hauls, appear to be hostile to a policy which would foster Texas jobbing and manufacturing interests, while other lines manifestly favor such a policy. Outside cities bring to bear every pressure they can to coerce all Texas lines into a course favorable to their interests and adverse to the interests of Texas cities with respect to jobbing and manufac-This commission has always had in mind the securing of relatively just State and interstate rates with a view of enabling Texas merchants and manufacturers to do business in competition with outsiders,'

"Passing, then, to the question of discrimination, has this commission the power to say that whatever rates an interstate carrier makes between points in Texas shall not be exceeded for the same distance under like conditions between Shreveport and Texas points? In other words, may a carrier engaged in interstate commerce discriminate against a city beyond the border of a State by imposing upon that city's traffic rates which deny its shippers access upon equal terms to the communities of an adjoining State?

"This is an appeal to the powers lodged in this commission under the third section of the act-that provision which is aimed at the destruction of undue preference and advantage. We thus meet directly the most delicate problem arising under our dual system of government. Congress asserts its exclusive dominion over interstate commerce; the State asserts its absolute control over State commerce. The State for its own purlute control over State commerce. poses establishes rates designed to protect its own communities and promote the development of its own industries. These rates are adopted by the interstate carriers upon State traffic, but are not adopted upon interstate traffic. Thus arises a discrimination in favor of communities within the State, and interstate commerce suffers a corresponding disadvantage. May this commission end such discrimination by saying to the interstate carrier, You may not distinguish between State and interstate traffic transported under similar conditions; if the rates prescribed for you by State authority are not compensatory upon this specific traffic as to which discrimination is found, the burden rests upon you, irrespective of your obligation to the State, to so adjust your rates that justice will be done between communities regardless of the invisible State line which divides them'? To which we are compelled to answer that the effective exercise of its power regarding interstate commerce makes necessary the assertion of the supreme authority of the Na-tional Government, and that the Congress has appropriately exercised this power in the provisions of the act to regulate commerce touching discrimination.

Congress has prohibited carriers of interstate commerce from giving undue preference or advantage to one community over another. To say that this prohibition permits such carriers to exclude a city within the State of Louisiana from doing business upon equal terms with the cities in Texas is to distort the plain meaning of the act and make the regulation of interstate commerce farcically ineffective. To say that interstate carriers may so discriminate because of the orders of a State commission is to admit that a State may limit and prescribe the flow of commerce between the States.

"And if one State may exercise its power of fixing rates so as to prefer its own communities all States may do so. There would thus arise a commercial condition more absurd and unbearable than that which obtained prior to the Constitution when each State sought to devise methods by which its commerce could be localized.

"An interstate carrier must respect the Federal law, and if it is also subjected to State law it must respect that in so far as it can without doing violence to its obligations under the national authority. Before us are carriers which undeniably discriminate directly against interstate traffic. To this charge they plead that all they have done was to obey the orders of a State commission, as against which they were helpless."

In opposition to the views set forth by Mr. Commissioner

Lane, speaking for the majority of the commission, Mr. Commissioner McChord says, in part: "To say that interstate carriers might discriminate because of such order would be an equal admission that this commission might limit and prescribe the flow of commerce between points in a State. In response to the suggestion that the Federal commerce power extended to all the affairs of a railroad if any part of its business was interstate, Mr. Chief Justice White, in Howard v. Illinois Central Railroad Co. (207 U. S., 463),

"'It assumes that because one engages in interstate commerce, he thereby endows Congress with power not delegated to it by the Constitution; in other words, with the right to legislate concerning matters of purely State concern. apparent that if the contention were well founded, it would extend the power of Congress to every conceivable subject, how ever inherently local; would obliterate all the limitations of power imposed by the Constitution, and would destroy the authority of the States as to all conceivable matters, which from the beginning have been and must continue to be under their control as long as the Constitution endures."

"It has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court that the power of the State over intrastate commerce is as full and complete as is the power of Congress over interstate commerce. In Sands v. Manistee River Improvement Co. (123 U. S., 288), the court, by Mr. Justice Field, said:

'Internal commerce of a State-that is, the commerce which is wholly confined within its limits-is as much under its control as foreign or interstate commerce is under the control of the General Government.'

"Of course, if in this instance we fix interstate rates by the Texas yardstick, we must fix other interstate rates by other State yardsticks, and may find ourselves encumbered with some 48 different rate meters, which will doubtless create a condi-tion 'more absurd and unbearable' than that which the majority opines would arise if the States remain unmolested in the exercise of their legitimate powers. But aside from this chaos, the Supreme Court has said that the function which the majority would delegate to the State of Texas can not by a State be constitutionally exercised, because:

"'The fact which vitiates the provision is that it compels the carrier to regulate, adjust, or fix his interstate rates with some reference at least to his rates within the State. (L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Eubank, 184 U. S., 41.)'"

The carriers against which the order of the Interstate Commerce Commission was made, in reply to the position taken by the commission, say:

First. If the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission be conceded, the discrimination is not yoluntary or illegal.

Second. The transportation affected is wholly within the State of Texas, constitutes no part of an interstate transit, and under the provision to section 1 of the act to regulate commerce the Interstate Commerce Commission has no jurisdiction to regulate the same.

Third. Has Congress the unlimited power to regulate intrastate commerce because conducted by interstate carriers, as asserted by the Interstate Commission

Mr. Chairman, I have given the position of the majority and the minority of the commission and the position of the railroad companies affected by the order, in order to show that there is great conflict between the very highest and most eminent authorities in our Nation on the questions involved in the Shreveport case, as also the position of the railroads to be affected. After having heard both sides to the contention, so as to understand the nature of the inevitable conflict between National and State authority in relation to the attempt to regulate interstate and intrastate rates and charges of the railroads, I want to ask in all candor if there is a Member of this House that would invest a dollar in a railroad to be constructed from some point in Arkansas, Louisiana, or Oklahoma, to and into the State of Texas, with equal mileage in both States?

What one State can do as to intrastate commerce all States can equally do, and with unlimited power in the States to regulate all purely intrastate commerce and with unlimited national power to regulate all interstate commerce, neverending conflict and litigation must ensue. It will be claimed in almost every case where an order of a State commission is made against an interstate carrier that the order has so intimate a connection with its functions as an interstate carrier as to materially affect its revenues and to thus in effect regulate its interstate business, and resort will be had by the carriers to the Federal courts, challenging the authority of the State to make the rate or regulation in almost every case of any considerable importance. With the tendency of the inferior Federal courts to take jurisdiction of every question in which a Federal element is alleged to arise, it will be practically impossible to have ready acquiescence in and obedience to the orders of State commissions touching orders affecting the intrastate business of interstate carriers to any considerable extent.

Mr. Chairman, whether or not Government ownership is to be forced upon this country depends almost entirely upon the owners and operators of our railroads doing interstate business. If we are to judge the future by the past, or even by current events, there is little on which to base a hope that Government ownership can be much longer deferred.

As further evidence of the trend of public sentiment as to the future control of transportation facilities, I now read a clipping from an eastern newspaper, as follows:

TOO MUCH WASTED ON RAILEOADS—NEW ENGLAND TIRED OF MISMANAGE-MENT, SAYS ANDERSON.

"Full protection for the investor in public-service corporations, as well as the rate-paying public, and wide open publicity as to the business of the public-service commission, was the sentiment expressed by Public Service Commissioner George W. Anderson in his address yesterday afternoon before Boston University Law School Association at the monthly dinner in the American House.

"In the matter of railroad regulation we don't deal with a small company, one locally controlled. The entire question is one with many ramifications, covering many other fields, and running into the so-called Money Trust. Our railroad organizations to-day are absolutely different in management and personnel than the locally owned gas companies were.

"It is not a question of what is going to happen to the New Haven or the Boston & Maine. It is a question of what two or three banking houses are going to do.

"Unless some intelligent cooperation between State commissions and the Interstate Commission can be worked out, it is only a matter of time when our entire transportation will be controlled from Washington and owned by the Federal Govern-

"New England, without natural resources except its seacoast and east wind, must depend on transportation for its development. If the gross mismanagement continues in the future as in the past, the investing public, as much as the rate-paying public, will be affected. The railroads will not be able to find another generation which will put up money to see it wasted, as it has been in the past, by mismanagement. In the common parlance of the street, 'suckers' won't put up any more money in railroads in the next few years."

Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that unless the private owners and operators of our railroads hastily retrace their steps, face about, and by undoing the wrongs they have done and in the future refrain from all like practices without asking a wronged and outraged public by way of increased freight charges to assume the losses brought on themselves that the demand for Government ownership and operation of our interstate carriers will become irresistible long before we have sufficient time to properly consider and prepare for so great an undertaking. Mr. Chairman, I think it may be well said of our railroad owners and operators that none are so blind as those who can but will not see.

In order to show just how private ownership of transportation lines has worked in this country when in the control and management of the most noted and strongest of our banking houses, I read from an article in Harper's Weekly, January 10, 1914, by Mr. Louis D. Brandeis, under the title of "A curse of bigness": "THE NEW HAVEN MONOPOLY.

"The rise of the New Haven monopoly presents another striking example of combination as a developer of financial concentration, and it illustrates also the use to which 'large security issues' are put.

"In 1892, when Mr. Morgan entered the New Haven directorate, it was a very prosperous little railroad, with capital liabilities of $25,000,000, paying 10 per cent dividends, and operating 508 miles of line. By 1899 the capitalization had grown to $80,477,600, but the aggregate mileage had also grown (mainly through merger or leases of other lines) to 2,017. Fourteen years later, in 1913, when Mr. Morgan died and Mr. Mellen resigned, the mileage was 1,997, just 20 miles less than in 1899. but the capital liabilities had increased to $425,935,000. Of course the business of the railroad had grown largely in those 14 years; the roadbed was improved, bridges built, additional tracks added, and much equipment purchased; and for all this new capital issues were needed; and additional issues were needed also because the company paid out in dividends more than it earned. But of the capital increase over $200,000,000 was expended in the acquisition of the stock or other securities of some 121 other railroads, steamships, street-railway, electriclight, gas, and water companies. It was these outside properties which made necessary the much-discussed $67,000,000 6 per cent bond issue, as well as other large and expensive security issues, for in these 14 years the improvements on the railroad, including new equipment, have cost, on the average, only $10,000,000 a year.

"THE BANKERS.

"Few, if any, of those 121 companies which the New Haven acquired had, prior to their absorption by it, been financed by J. P. Morgan & Co. The needs of the Boston & Maine and Maine Central—the largest group—had, for generations, been met mainly through their own stockholders or through Boston banking houses. No investment banker had been a member of the board of directors of either of those companies. The New York, Ontario & Western-the next largest of the acquired railroadshad been financed in New York, but by persons apparently entirely independent of the Morgan alliance. The smaller Connecticut railroads, now combined in the Central New England, had been financed mainly in Connecticut or by independent New York bankers. The financing of the street railway companies had been done largely by individual financiers or by small and independent bankers in the States or cities where companies operate. Some of the steamship companies had been financed by their owners, some through independent bankers. As the result of the absorption of these 121 companies into the New Haven system, the financing of all these railroads, steamship companies, street railways, and other corporations were made tributary to J. P. Morgan & Co., and the independent bankers were eliminated or became satellites. And this financial concentration was proceeded with, although practically every one of these 121 companies was acquired by the New Haven in violation either of the State or Federal law, or of both. Enforcement of the Sherman Act will doubtless result in dissolving this unwieldy illegal combination.

"OTHER RAILROAD COMBINATIONS.

"The cases of the Union Pacific and of the New Haven are typical, not exceptional. Our railroad history presents numerous instances of large security issues made wholly or mainly to effect combinations. Some of these combinations have been proper as a means of securing natural feeders or extensions of main lines. But far more of them have been dictated by the desire to suppress active or potential competition or by personal ambition or greed or by the mistaken belief that efficiency grows with size.

"Thus the monstrous combination of the Rock Island and the St. Louis & San Francisco with about 16,000 miles of line is recognized now to have been obviously inefficient. It was severed voluntarily, but had it not been, must have crumbled soon from inherent defects if not as a result of proceedings under the Sherman law. Both systems are suffering now from the effects of this unwise combination; the Frisco, itself greatly overcombined, has paid the penalty in receivership. The Rock Island-a name once expressive of railroad efficiency and stability-has, through its excessive recapitalization and combinations, become a football of speculators and a source of great apprehension to confiding investors. The combination of the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton and the Pere Marquette led to several receiver-

"There are, of course, other combinations which have not been disastrous to the owners of the railroads. But the fact that a railroad combination has not been disastrous does not necessarily justify it. The evil of the concentration of power is obvious; and as combination necessarily involves such concentration of power, the burden of justifying a combination should be placed upon those who seek to effect it."

Mr. Chairman, all the populistic and socialistic arguments that have ever been made in favor of Government ownership and management of our railroads pale into utter insignificance in weight and force when compared with the simple, unpainted, unexaggerated statement of the facts as to how some of our greatest systems of railroads have been built up and capitalized.

As an illustration of how one of the greatest railway systems of the country has been financed, I now read from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the advanced rates investigation in official classification territory, decided February,

"The New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. came into existence in 1869 by a consolidation of the New York Central Railroad Co. and the Hudson River Railroad Co. dence before us fairly shows that the capital stock of the New York Central Co. contained $9,000,000 which had been issued without the payment of any present consideration, and that the stock of the Hudson River Co. had been increased in like manner by something over $3,000,000. At the time of the consolidation the capital stock of the two companies was further increased without the payment of any present consideration by the amount of substantially $45,000,000, issued in proportions agreed upon to the stockholders of the new company. Since that date all issues of the capital stock of this company have been for cash at par or above par, but the capital stock contains $57,000,-000 par value for which nothing was ever paid.

"The dividends paid upon this capital stock for the last 40 years will probably average 6 per cent. During that time there has been actually paid in dividends to the holders of this $57,-000,000 of stock at least $120,000,000. Had the New York Central & Hudson River Co., instead of paying these amounts to its stockholders, invested them in its property, the funded debt of that company might have been reduced by $120,000,000, not having reference to interest. If account be taken of interest, the amount would be much larger.

This company has, therefore, as a result of this transaction a capital stock $57,000,000 in excess of what it would be and either a funded debt or a capital stock at least $120,000,000 greater than would be the case if the original issues of stock had never been made.'

Here was an instance of where the stockholders of two railroad companies, in consolidating their lines, issued stock to themselves in the enormous sum of $57,000,000 for which not one cent was ever paid in money, property, or services—pure water, and nothing more—upon which the freight and passenger paying public have since paid in dividends more than $120,000,000. making in all, since the date of the consolidation of these two roads in 1869, the appalling sum of more than $179,000,000 which has been added to the wealth of their owners without any legal, equitable, or moral consideration of any kind. At this hour this guilty corporation is pleading before the Interstate Commerce Commission to be permitted to increase its freight rates 5 per cent in order to continue to further reward the holders of this spurious stock issue by a continuance of an unjust and unholy dividend payment on same. Such an act would put to shame all the robber barons of the Middle Ages.

This is a sample of private ownership and management of the greatest railroad property in this country. Many people ask, Could Government ownership and management be worse?

Mr. Chairman, in a statement made by Charles A. Prouty, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the members of the public service commissions of Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire, and Maine, bearing on the present condition of the Boston & Maine Railroad Co., dated Boston, November 24, 1913, the following appears:

"The Boston & Maine has outstanding $27,000,000 of shorttime paper, which it will carry for the current year at a charge of about 7½ per cent, as compared with 5½ per cent for the preceding year. Of this short-time paper, $20,000,000 was used to purchase stocks which the Boston & Maine now owns."

Is not this an astonishing revelation in view of the fact that this is one of the railroad companies asking an increase in freight rates on account of an increase in wages?

While making such a plea it is actually carrying a debt of $27,000,000 borrowed money at loan-shark cutthroat rates of interest, incurred in order to purchase the stocks of another railroad company. All this unjust and usurious rate of interest must be paid by the consumers of the country. Is it any wonder that they are beginning to sit up and take notice and ask themselves, Can public ownership be any worse?

In another place in the same report the following statement appears:

"In our opinion, the salaries paid the chief executives and frequently the other chief officials of the principal railroad systems of the United States, ranging as they do from $50,000 to $100,000 annually in case of the chief executive, are utterly extravagant. These positions are not properly private places, to which the corporations may attach any compensation which its stockholders ratify; they are quasi public in their character, and the reasonableness of the amount paid may properly be inquired into, especially where the corporation is asking to impose an additional transportation tax.

Such compensation of railroad officials to be paid by the public in the nature of a tax upon transportation is nothing less than plain, undisguised robbery.

The justices of the Supreme Court of the United States receive only $14,000 in salary annually. The President of the United States only $75,000. The members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, a body of great transportation experts, who have supervision and control of all the interstate railroad rates in the whole country, receive only $10,000 per annum in salary.

Is it any surprise that the people who are taxed to pay these outrageous salaries are beginning to think that there is no justification for longer submitting to the banker-controlled and banker-financed roads under private ownership, when as Gov-ernment officials the same men would perform all the legitimate and necessary functions they now perform for perhaps less than one-fourth of what they now receive?

If Government ownership of our railroads ever comes in this country, it will be brought on by the demonstrated failure of private ownership to give to the people the service they are entitled to and will have.

As I have just said, the passage of a thousand Alaskan railroad bills like the one now pending will not bring it on, and the defeat of a thousand such bills will not prevent it.

Mr. Chairman, there is no way to prevent Government ownership of all the railroads in this country except through the friendly, cordial, and active cooperation of all the railroads, and all the State railroad commissions, with the Interstate Commerce Commission, in a sincere and honest joint effort to give the whole people the best possible service for the lowest possible charge.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to prefer a similar request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] also asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be able to bring myself to believe that Alaska can become an agricultural possibility, for I would like to realize that continental America has close to its border such a vast area of land that could be turned into utilization.

But I have not been able to convince myself of such a possibility, and I regret it. We have had five agricultural experiment stations in Alaska for a long time. One of these stations has recently been abandoned, and four of them still remain. They have been endeavoring to do agricultural experimental work. In the course of their efforts to do that they have expended $298,000, and they have been able to produce as the result of their labors products valued at the sum of only $22,000 in return for that expenditure.

Information obtained from the weather stations shows that frost occurs in Alaska every month in the year, and it is said by those who know more about it than I do that all of Alaska is frozen, so far as it can freeze, to the bedrock. How we can hope to develop agriculture in such a country is more than I can understand.

Wheat, as everybody will agree, never matures there. Those who attempt to raise it have to cut it when it is green and use it for fodder, and there is not very much fodder at that. They tell me-these experts who have been there on the part of the Government investigating the possibilities of Alaska-that if we hope to raise any agricultural products there the land must be fertilized every year and crops attempted to be raised only every other year.

There are only 163 homesteaders there. This is the total number of people who have patented homesteads, although our homestead laws have been in force and are still in force. If agriculture is such an easy thing in Alaska, I would like to understand why it is that in all the years of our ownership of this vast Territory only 163 people have patented homesteads. It does not seem to have attracted the men and women who believe in agriculture, and this indictment of the Territory as an agricultural region forces me to the conclusion that we ought not to expend the vast sum of $85,000,000 in the construction of a railroad there.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I regret I have only 10 minutes. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MADDEN. It is said by those who know that the cost of clearing an acre of land up there amounts to from $125 to $150 per acre-nearly as much money as it would cost to buy the best acre of land in the State of Illinois. Surely there can be no comparison between the opportunities for agriculture in a country like Alaska and in a State like Illinois, whose every acre of land is richer than any acre of land in the Valley of the Nile or in any other place on the earth; and I invite the critical consideration of what agriculture can be developed in Alaska if it costs $125 or $150 per acre to clear the land before you begin your attempt at agriculture, and when the fact is taken into consideration that after the land is cleared no crops can be raised the question may well be asked, "What is the land worth?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Charman, which egenteman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Surely.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman let me observe there that of the 178,000,000 acres of farm lands along the Atlantic coast, east of the Appalachian chain, in the territory of the Eastern States, there is still left 78,000,000 acres of land now?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; and there are 300,000,000 acres of public lands in continental America, owned by the Government of the United States, onto which any person may go for the asking.

One of the arguments for the appropriation of this $35,000,000 is that $18,000,000 of gold is produced in Alaska annually. Everybody knows that $18,000,000 of gold would not furnish any freight. Any ordinary box car, hauled in an ordinary freight train, would carry all the gold that is produced in Alaska every year, so that that would not be much of an inducement for the investment of $35,000,000 in the construction of a railroad, would it? It does not appeal to me, at any rate.

All of the freight in and out of Alaska last year amounted to less than 35,000 tons, and most of this was by boat. It will be readily seen that 35,000 tons of freight would amount to not more than 10 ordinary trainloads.

The principal industries of Alaska at present are fish and furs. It is not necessary to build a railroad to carry the furs. do not furnish any tonnage. The fish are all produced from the sea and surely a railroad is not necessary to transport them. What inducement there can be for the construction of a railroad at Government expense or for granting authority to the President to buy the railroads already there is more than I can see. The fur business will not be disturbed because of lack of rail transportation. There will be no less furs than now. fisheries industry will not be in anywise curtailed. It will move forward with the same degree of activity as at present, railroad or no railroad. Then what is the inducement for the expenditure of this vast sum of money? Why are we jumping headlong into such extravagance?

I am opposed to Government ownership of railroads, but whether I were opposed to that or not I would be opposed to the expenditure of this vast sum of money under the circumstances.

The Bering coal fields are only 25 miles from the coast line, and all the arguments thus far made give as an excuse for the expenditure of this $35,000,000 the development of the Bering coal fields.

If one million dollars will do the job, why spend thirty-five? But can the proposed railroad be constructed for $35,000,000? am persuaded not. Nobody knows what the cost will be. Everyone knows for certain that Government undertakings are concluded at a much larger outlay, as a rule, than the original estimate, and it will not surprise me to learn, if I shall be so fortunate as to see the consummation of this project, that $100,000,-000 has been taken from the Public Treasury for this purpose.

By all means common sense should be used, and the common sense of this situation is that if a railroad is to be constructed at all to build the road from the coast line to the Bering coal fields. If the experiment of operating such a line should prove to be successful and the Bering River coal proves to be of anything like the value suggested by other speakers, and if it turns out later that the development of the Matanuska coal fields is necessary, the road can be extended; but to authorize a road now without any well-defined plan as to where it shall go, or what it will do, or where the tonnage to maintain it is to come from, is a utopian dream which ought not to be indulged in by the Congress at the expense of the American people.

Many men on the floor of the House are prompted to vote for the pending bill because they believe the administration wants it; not because they believe in it; not because they think it wise; not because they think the expenditure will yield returns or develop Alaska; but because of their desire to please the powers that be; in other words, because they believe it to be politically expedient.

Politics should not enter into the expenditure of such a vast sum of money. This is a business proposition. It ought to be treated as such. The same sagacity should be exercised that a wise business man would exercise in laying the foundation for a successful enterprise.

I hope this will be a success if the plan is carried into execution, but I have my doubts. My doubts are justified by all the facts, and I shall be obliged, in the performance of what I believe to be my conscientious duty, to vote against the bill in its present form.

There are only 35,000 white people in Alaska. In response to a question asked by me of Mr. Wickersham, the Delegate from Alaska, as to what proportion of that population would be served by the construction of all the railroad mileage authorized by this bill, he said he thought about one-half. But I have information which leads me to conclude that not more than 10 per cent of the 35,000 people there would be served by the construction of the seven hundred and thirty odd miles of railroad proposed by this bill.

Now, if nobody is to be accommodated by the construction of the railroad, why build it? But it is said we have coal fields in Alaska. It is true we have. But the coal fields, as I have said before, that have been exploited or partially developed, from which the coal has been tested, are close to the sea, not more than 25 miles away from the shore. These coal fields need no railroad for their development, or if they do, they can not possibly need more than 25 miles of railroad, and I would be willing to build 25 miles of railroad if perchance these coal fields could be developed for the advantage of the American

But why spend $35,000,000 in building seven hundred and odd miles of railroad from nowhere to nowhere if 25 miles of road at the outside, at the expense of a million dollars, will do the thing that the advocates of this bill claim they want to do? No wise business man would do what they are undertaking to do.

It is putting the cart before the horse.

The Navy says that they have tested this coal, and I am told upon reliable authority that the coal which was tested was taken from a depth of 100 feet from the surface. The tests show that the coal has only 43 per cent of the value of Pocahontas coal and is unfit for naval use, and the information that I have in my possession leads me to conclude that Pocahontas coal is the class of coal that must be used for the Navy. But the Navy says that we are building our ships for the purpose of using oil as fuel in the future; and if we are, we need

There are nine railroads in Alaska now, all bankrupt. heard it stated on the floor of this House that the men who own these railroads are crooks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois

Mr. MADDEN. I wonder whether this bill is being pressed for the purpose of buying out what they have? If it is, it ought to be defeated. If they are crooks, they ought to be prosecuted by the Government of the United States instead of the Government of the United States, through the Congress, enacting laws to relieve them from the losses which they have made by the construction of those bankrupt railroads.

has expired.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the committee on reporting this bill. Against an almost instinctive prejudice, against an organized and powerful opposition, to have done so exhibited courage and a fine example of devotion to convictions of duty, rather than an easy yielding to pressure and a compla-cent acquiescence in existing conditions. [Applause.] While I approve the general purpose of the bill, I do not agree that all its provisions should be retained, and I shall endeavor to convince the committee and the House that some modifications of its terms should be made.

Preliminary to the consideration of the changes which I shall propose, I will briefly refer to some of the objections urged against the bill, none of which, in my judgment, are sufficient to justify its defeat, if it shall be properly amended.

OBJECTIONS CONSIDERED.

First. It is urged as an objection to the bill that building a railroad will not solve the problems of Alaskan development; that what is needed is either a reversal of the Executive orders that have tied up her resources, or a revision of the laws affecting them, so that they may be opened to private capital and enterprise.

I am in entire agreement with the statement of Mr. Secretary Lane that-

There is but one way to make any country a real part of the world—by the construction of railroads into it. That has been the heart of England's policy in Africa, of Russia's policy in western Asia, and is the prompting hope of the new movement in China.

It may be added that this is the policy by which Canada has built up with such marvelous celerity the Canadian Northwest. It is not a new policy. Rome bound the Provinces to the Imperial Government by her great system of highways. It can hardly be said that a Territory is annexed that is not made accessible.

The testimony is overwhelming that there can be no development of Alaskan resources without the aid of railways. is admitted by both the friends and foes of the bill. The latter seem to believe that the necessary railroads can be secured by opening the resources of Alaska to private exploitation. is only partially true. If the coal fields were opened to private interests, railroads would unquestionably be built to them; but it is generally believed that the price to be paid by the adoption of this plan would be altogether too much. It is now apparent that the American people will not permit exploitation through private ownership. The Government has the title and will hold it. A leasing or royalty system is the only possible manner in which Alaskan coal resources can be made available. That being true, the interest which the Government must have in coal transportation is much more intimate. If ownership or leasing in commanding proportion to individual interests is to be prevented, then the primary incentive to private railway building is removed. Granted that neither private ownership nor monopolistic control will be permitted, it follows that no railroads will be built by private interests even to the coal fields.

On the other hand, it must be apparent that if the Government builds railroads to the coal fields, it must open them to the people, not to be exploited by large corporations, but to smaller, competitive companies, with equal privileges and a fair field. That this is the better course would seem almost selfevident.

But even if it should be admitted that private enterprise might build railroads to the coal fields, that would still leave the problem unsolved of how to bring railroads into the interior. The best coal fields are near the coast. Mountain ranges separate the great interior valleys from the open sea. Any development of the great interior, with its thousands of miles of river transportation and its millions of acres with undeveloped agricultural and mineral resources, is dependent on railways to the sea.

The report of the United States Geological Survey for January, 1914, says:

While the coastal region is developing at a rate which bids fair to overshadow all mining operations in the interior, no marked progress can be expected in the inland region until a transportation system is provided. * * Therefore, railway construction is of first important. tance to Alaska.

It is evident, from a careful examination of the evidence before both the House and Senate committees, that there never has been any real good-faith expectation or endeavor on the part of private enterprise to build a railroad to the interior. Promises have been made as an inducement to promote special interests and particular projects, but, these purposes secured, extensions to the interior would have been abandoned. I am satisfied that the Government is not only justified but is required by its obligations and its duty to secure at least one railroad from the coast to the interior. If it can not induce such enterprise, if it can not subsidize it, it should itself build and control it.

Second. It is urged that it is unfair to grant $35,000,000 to 35,000 white people in Alaska when our own people need the money so much.

This objection is based upon a misconception-all too generally indulged-that an appropriation is a special favor, a gratuity to be handed around. Certainly argument is not needed against such a theory. If there were no people in Alaska, conditions might well justify building a railroad there. And if there were 10,000,000 instead of 35,000 people, the Government should not build a foot of railroad unless conditions justified it. If we are wise and regardful of our obligations, we will not attempt to distribute gratuities or equalize special privilege

But Alaska, from even the most materialistic and selfish standpoint, is entitled to our respectful consideration.

It may be of interest to know what was thought regarding the wisdom of our course in spending $7,200,000 for the purchase of Alaska in 1868. It is probable the motives which induced action were political rather than economic. There was scant knowledge of the territory, and its acquisition occasioned surprise rather than approval. There was a minority report of the committee, a majority of which reported the bill for acquisition. This minority report declared that Alaska had "no capacity as an agricultural country; that, so far as known, it has no value as a mineral country"; that "its fur trade is of insignificant value"; that "the fisheries are of doubtful value"; that "the right to govern a nation or nations of savages in a dispete upon the position of civilized ment was not worthy climate unfit for the habitation of civilized men was not worthy of purchase.'

But merely as an investment the purchase is amply justified. Alaska cost us $7,200,000. It has already returned to us in revenue paid into the United States Treasury $17,117,000.

The minority report objecting to its acquisition declared Alaska had no value as a mineral country. Since then we have Since then we have taken from it in mineral products $206,813,000.

Its fur trade was reported as of "insignificant value." It has produced over $62,681,000 in furs.

"The fisheries are of doubtful value." We have derived already from the Alaska fisheries $147,953,000.

Altogether the known value of these products exceeds $429,-

It has been estimated that Alaska has more coal than Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and Ohio combined; more copper than Michigan and Arizona; more gold than California and Colorado; and more fish than all the other American waters combined. For her population Alaska produces far more than any State in the Nation.

Regarding the amount of appropriation asked for I shall be able to convince the committee, I hope, that the amount carried in the bill may be greatly reduced—almost cut in two

But gentlemen should remember that only $1,000,000 is actually appropriated under the terms of this bill. The remainder to be expended will be derived from the sale of bonds for the payment of which a redemption fund is provided. Into this fund shall be paid one-half of the proceeds derived from the sale, or from rentals and royalties of all public, coal, or mineral lands in Alaska, as well as proceeds from the sale of timber lands. The net earnings of the railroad shall also be paid into the fund to pay the interest and principal of the construction bonds. It is my judgment the Government will never be called upon to make an appropriation to pay these bonds. In order to increase the probabilities of such desirable result, I shall introduce an amendment to make the payments 90 per cent instead of 50 per cent, which I hope will commend itself to the committee.

Third. It is urged that if the building of railroads in Alaska will not pay as a private investment it will not pay as a Government project.

The statement sounds logical and seems reasonable. careful consideration of existing conditions will show that it is neither. It is quite evident that no railroads, merely as such, will be built in Alaska. If the Government will surrender the coal fields to investors and exploiters, undoubtedly they will build railroads from these fields to coast harbors and markets. But no private corporation without special privileges granted will build to the interior. No projector has in mind the build-ing of a railroad to develop the country, to bring in settlers, to stimulate agriculture, to encourage stock raising.

If private corporations were granted the coal fields, they would immediately and gladly build railroads to develop them.

If private individuals were able to secure title to the lands they would be only too willing to build railroads to make them available and salable. That which would be good policy on the part of private interests, if they owned these resources, can not be bad policy on the part of the Government which does own them.

But the Government has a much greater and higher interest in Alaskan development than mere profit on an investment. It is a nation builder. It is not limited to an inquiry as to how much per acre it can sell its land, or how much per bushel it can obtain as rental or royalty for its coal. It realizes that it holds these resources in trust for its people; primarily for those of its citizens who shall locate in the particular Territory, and secondarily for the people of the Nation, who must protect it and develop it as a part of the Nation's domain. Whatever shall further these larger interests is justified and a duty.

Fourth. It is strongly and repeatedly urged that to construct a railroad in Alaska commits the Government to the policy of Government ownership and operation of railroads everywhere within our territory.

This is an old and oft-repeated objection to Government action, as absurd as it is popular. Government action should always be governed by the requirements of the occasion which necessitates such action. The Government must act within its constitutional limitations, and those are its only restraints. It can act in one case and refuse to act in another. It may determine arbitrarily just how far it will go in any line of action. It has no master and submits to no control except that which is self-imposed.

It certainly does not follow that because the United States owns and operates a railroad in Panama that such action means a departure from our established policy, and that the Government means to buy and operate all the railroads. It by no means follows that because the Government in the Canal Zone built churches and furnished preachers, gave dances and or-ganized clubs, built schoolhouses and hired teachers, ran hotels, barber shops, and ice-cream parlors, it thereby has adopted a socialistic policy and expects to do the same all over the land.

The Government has aided some railroads, but it has not aided all. The Government has aided railroads in cases where existing conditions warranted such action. It has refused to aid railroads where aid was not warranted. It may and will build or purchase or operate railroads where conditions warrant or require such action, and it will refuse to do so when such action is not warranted. Having the undoubted constitutional right, we ought to determine each proposition as it arises on its merits and act accordingly.

I have no fear that by building a railroad in Alaska we will thereby commit ourselves to a general policy of Government ownership of railroads. There will doubtless be in the future instances where the Government will be called upon to consider whether it is advantageous or necessary to build or purchase a railroad. Whenever such individual instance shall arise we shall be free as we are now to judge and pass upon it on its merits and for the best interests of the Nation.

Fifth. It is urged that Alaska is a bleak and barren region where agriculture and stock raising is impossible and is not worth developing.

With infinite delight gentlemen have selected all the derogatory statements that could be found concerning Alaska, and have asked us to accept such statements as faithfully descrip-

Alaska has an area of over 590,000 square miles. It is an empire in dimensions. Over 100,000 square miles—an area nearly as large as Iowa and Illinois combined—is subject to cultivation. Thirty thousand square miles, or nearly 20,000,000 acres, can be made available for tillage. All Government experts, and there have been many, unite in placing the agricultural resources of Alaska and the possibilities of their development at a very high standard.

George H. Eldridge, of the Geological Survey, says of the Susitna Valley—one only of the many susceptible of agricultural development, in itself a region 150 miles long by 125 miles

It gives promise of an agricultural value little short, it is believed, of many of the most prosperous regions of the United States. * * * The soils of the valley are rich in loam and decayed vegetation, extending to depths of from 4 to 10 feet.

Prof. Georgeson, in charge of the agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, after years of experiment and experience, says:

That Alaska has agricultural possibilities of a sufficiently high order to make it self-supporting is no longer open to dispute. * * At these various stations all the hardy vegetables have been grown successfully every year. * * * We have never falled to mature barley and oats in the most unfavorable seasons, and in normal years we have also matured winter wheat and winter rye, spring wheat, spring rye, and buckwheat. * * Moreover these results can be bettered. * * We shall in the near future, by selection and breeding, be able to develop varieties which shall be better suited to Alaska than anything we now have, and it is therefore certain that the results will be improved upon.

As against the violent denunciations we have heard may be set the calm and deliberate conclusions of Mr. Secretary Lane, which he gives as the result of the most careful and painstaking investigation:

I am convinced that we should think of Alaska as a land not only of mines and fisheries, but of towns, farms, mills, and factories, supporting millions of people of the hardiest and most wholesome of the

That is a statement made from high authority both from an official and political standpoint.

But I shall quote a still higher authority. President Wilson, in his annual message delivered to this House last December, in the strongest terms recommended action such as is contemplated in this bill. He said:

AN ADMINISTRATION POLICY.

A duty faces us with regard to Alaska which seems to me very pressing and very imperative; perhaps I should say a double duty, for it concerns both the political and the material development of the Territory. The people of Alaska should be given the full Territorial form of government, and Alaska, as a storehouse, should be unlocked. One key to it is a system of railroads. These the Government should itself build and administer, and the ports and terminals it should itself control in the interest of all who wish to use them for the service and development of the country and its people.

In the repeated assaults made by Democrats against this determined and declared policy of the administration it is said that no action is necessary. The President says that not only is such action a duty, but that it is a duty which is "very pressing and very imperative." These gentlemen declare that the storehouse of Alaskan resources is empty, but that, if it contains anything, the way is open and anybody can help them-The President says the storehouse is locked and that one of the keys is a system of railroads. The opponents of this bill say that under no circumstances should the Government engage in railway building in Alaska. The President says the Government should not only build, but should "administer," and that the Government should control the ports and terminals.

It will be found, I believe, that almost anyone coming without bias to an examination of existing conditions in Alaska will reach the conclusion that the Government is not only justified but required to take some action such as is contemplated by this bill

We, the people of the United States, own in Alaska a vast undeveloped, unimproved estate. More than one-half of the unsold public domain lies there. We should make it available. We should take steps to place these lands on the market and under cultivation. We should make it possible to develop its under cultivation. We should make it possible to develop its resources—to dig the coal, to mine the gold and copper, to enlarge our fisheries, to increase our revenues and strengthen our outposts. And the question has a humanitarian side as well. We would thus legislate to make homes for a great people; we would provide an extension of the fields of enterprise and opportunity; we would enlarge the scope of human endeavor. Every such enlargement brings hope and the promise of happiness to American citizenship, and a glow of exultation that these blessings are to be found under our flag, and that our ambitious and energetic youth will not be required to expatriate themselves, and seek fields of enterprise in foreign lands.

SOME DESIRABLE CHANGES.

But while I am in favor of the legislation and desire to see action taken which will secure the results desired, I do not approve of the bill reported by the committee in its present form. With some changes which will both improve the bill and reduce the appropriation I believe it should pass.

In the first place, the bill does not carry out the first of its declared objects, which is "to connect the interior with the

The bill is based on the report and recommendations of the Alaska Railroad Commission. The commission recommends building two systems with a total mileage of 733 miles and a total cost estimated at $35,611,000. One of these systems has two branches which do not connect with each other—one extending from Chitina to Fairbanks, a distance of 313 miles, known as the Copper River line, the estimated cost of which is $13,971,000; the other, a branch line, leaving the main line of the present Copper River & Northwestern Railway at a point 38 miles north of its southern terminus, Cordova, and extending eastward via Lake Charlotte to the Bering coal fields, a distance of 38 miles, the estimated cost of which is $2,054,000.

It will be noted that Chitina is the present northern terminus of the Copper River & Northwestern Railway, known in this discussion as the Guggenheim line. Chitina is 132 miles from Cordova on the coast, and the proposed line from Fairbanks to Chitina will not extend from the interior to the coast, as is desired and proposed, but will leave the Government raflway hung up at a mountain village 132 miles from a seaport. Shipments can not be made from the seaboard to the interior nor from the interior to an open port without accepting the rates, terms, and service of the Guggenheim line for 132 miles. The only alternative to this will be the purchase of the Guggenheim line, with their terminals, by the Government, which would involve an additional cost of $20,000,000.

It should be further noted that the Bering coal branch does not reach a market, but is to be built from the coal fields to the Guggenheim line, 38 miles from Cordova. Neither the Government nor private parties who may develop the Bering coal fields can under this arrangement market their coal without accepting the terms and accommodations of the Guggenheim line for 38 miles.

To build these proposed patches and parts of lines, dependent for their efficacy on the good offices or the purchase or condemnation of the Guggenheim line, is, in my judgment, an utterly impracticable and indefensible proposal.

The other proposed system consists of three divisions—one extending from Kern Creek to the Susitna Valley, a distance of 115 miles, the estimated cost of which is $5,209,500; another, the Matanuska coal branch, extending from the main line to the coal fields, a distance of 38 miles, the estimated cost of which is $1,616,000; the third extending from the Susitna Valley to the Kuskokwim, a distance of 229 miles, the estimated cost of which is $12,760,500.

Kern Creek is the northern terminus of the Alaska Northern Railroad and is 72 miles from Seward, its southern seaport terminus. So that this system, like the other, is hung up in the interior and must either depend on the good graces of the Alaska Northern Railway Co. or purchase the line, which its owners say cost $5,000,000. The Kuskokwim extension at this time is ab-The valley of the Kuskokwim has hardly been touched by settlement. It is estimated that there are barely 500 people in the valley, except the gold miners. There has never been any general demand or expectation of a railroad there, and the proposition to expend nearly $13,000,000 now on a railroad extension into this region ought not to be seriously considered.

The committee report says:

The commission has recommended the construction of two branch lines to reach coal fields that do not lie directly on the trunk lines, and these are needed at once, in order to connect the main lines with the coal fields.

It is here assumed that this means the trunk lines which the Government will build or acquire. Yet the branch from the Matanuska coal fields would have to connect with a railroad now owned and controlled by a private corporation, with which the Government would have to make traffic arrangements over 72 miles of its line or purchase the line, and no such purchase is contemplated in the bill, nor will the amount appropriated include such purchase.

The branch from the Bering coal fields would connect not with the Government line, but with the Guggenheim line, with whom the Government would have to go into partnership or purchase their line. This would doubtless please the Guggenheims, but, unfortunately, we would have no means, under the provisions of this bill, even to do that.

But the committee says in its report the bill does not bind the President to these plans. He may use his discretion. may build one or more lines, as he shall determine, provided he shall carry out the general plan. The committee would not even bind the President as to the number of lines or systems. He may build a "line or lines." The report says:

One may be sufficient, and one would be of incalculable benefit, and we are entirely content to leave this matter to the wisdom and judgment of the President.

But why the President? We ought to legislate, and not the President. We are to determine, and not the President. are guilty of an abandonment of our obligations to say to him, "We believe they need railroads in Alaska, but we do not know how many they should have or where they should be located." How shall the President know better than we? How ridiculous it makes us appear to confess that we do not know enough to determine and to say to the President, "Now you guess."

We did not so act in building the Panama Canal. Suppose we should have said to the President, "We can not determine between Panama, Nicaragua, or Tehuantepec; you decide for us.'

Gentlemen who modestly profess their lack of knowledge of which route should be chosen should understand that if their lack of knowledge extends to a want of ability to determine between lines, it would of necessity be such as to prevent their determination upon any line. How shall it be possible for us to determine the necessity of any, if we can not determine be-tween one or many or the location of even one?

When we authorize a river or harbor improvement or authorize a bridge or build a building, we determine where it should be located. We do not "leave the matter to the wisdom and judgment of the President." We also do not shirk our duty and throw the responsibility on the President. If we shall send this bill to him in its present form, he would be entirely justified in believing that we desired to have him carry out the recommendation of the commission, as that is the basis on which the bill is formed. And yet, not one, even, of the committee desires that to be done. How silly it would make us appear to vote this large sum of the people's money to build roads that begin nowhere, that run nowhere, and that end nowhere.

And yet, we know what we want and what is needed. The objects of the bill are clearly and well stated. We are not ignorant of the facts, nor of the needs to be supplied, nor of the means to supply them. We have a wealth of material upon which to form a judgment. Our commission, an able and impartial one, has gone there and reported. Are we to have another? If so, let us provide for one and have its report before we act. We have had numerous official reports and extensive hearings. When the President is called upon to act, he can have no better means of arriving at a conclusion than we have. He can not act on his own knowledge; he must be advised. Who can we trust to advise him better than ourselves, upon whom can we trust to advise him better than ourselves, upon whom rest the responsibility of legislation?

All this is entirely unnecessary. We can, by providing one line, accomplish all the purposes desired and specified in the bill. A few things are well established and will furnish an unfailing guide to our action. We should abandon the Cordova-Chitina-Fairbanks-Bering project entirely. First, because it would be consummate folly to build Government railroads or parts of railroads which must be dependent on the good will, administration or possible action of a private corporation. We administration, or possible action of a private corporation. can under no circumstances justify a partnership or traffic arrangement or any possible connection with the Guggenheims. That eliminates the proposed line from Chitina to Fairbanks and the branch to the Bering fields entirely.

At this time we should build one system, not two. We can by building one system carry out the declared purpose of this bill and greatly reduce the cost. We can connect an open Pacific harbor on the southern coast with the navigable waters in the interior of Alaska. We can reach coal fields, both for naval use and for fuel for the interior. We can reach the best agricultural and mineral regions in Alaska. We can thus aid in the development of its resources. This line will have for its northern terminus Fairbanks and the Tanana Valley, thus reaching the great interior river system of Alaska. There the resources of the great Yukon and its subsidiary tributaries can be transshipped to the sea coast and to the world's markets, and their machinery and supplies can be transported over a line which shall be Government owned and Government controlled.

The southern terminus should be Seward, on Resurrection Bay, or Portage Bay, or both. Resurrection Bay is without doubt the best harbor on the Alaskan coast and one of the best harbors in the world. It is spacious, its waters are deep enough to float our largest battleships, it is landlocked, and ice-free the year round. To reach Seward on Resurrection Bay would necessitate the purchase of the Alaska Northern Railroad. The advantages which would accrue would well warrant that, and the cost would not be excessive.

This purchase may be avoided and 63 miles of railway saved by making the southern terminus Portage Bay, which opens into Prince Williams Sound, and is, while smaller, a deep, landlocked, and ice-free harbor.

A branch from the main line, 38 miles in length, would reach the Matanuska coal fields, which are admittedly the largest and best in Alaska.

The main line would also pass through the Nenana coal fields, the largest and best interior supply in Alaska.

The total length of the line from Portage Bay to Fairbanks, with the Matanuska extension, would be 441 miles, and its probable cost $17,640,000. To Seward the line would be 493 miles long, and the cost about $20,000,000. It is thought by Government experts that the line could include both terminals for the latter amount.

This will make a complete system, entirely independent of any connection with private interests. It will reduce the cost nearly one-half. It will accomplish all we ought at this time to do. It will reach the desired termini by the best route. The Tenana and Susitna Valleys are the best and most promising agricultural regions in Alaska. If they can not be developed, none can. This line will reach the best and largest coal field for naval use and coastal traffic, the Matanuska. It will reach and pierce the Nenana coal fields, which embrace a territory of 165 square miles, or over 100,000 acres; the coal in which the Geological Survey estimates at 10,000,000,000 tons, an inex-haustible supply for fuel for interior Alaska. It will furnish a means of transportation for machinery and supplies to the interior, and for ores and furs and other products from the interior to the coast and a market.

All these desirable and necessary advantages can be secured by building this one line. No other proposed line can secure them. Why, then, should we hesitate? Let us, if we have courage enough to act at all, have courage to act definitely, and as our best judgment dictates. [Applause.]

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Chairman, the question before us is not the Government ownership of railways, nor is it altogether a question of the advisability of Government construction of railways in Alaska. It is a question as to how the resources of that treasure land shall be developed. Of course, the resources of Alaska must pay for their own development. The question of Alaska must pay for their own development. The question is, Shall the people of the United States, who own the natural resources of Alaska, give a big portion of those resources to private capital for their development or shall we develop those resources ourselves and mortgage them, as it were, to pay for the facilities for their development?

The argument as to whether railway construction in Alaska will be profitable all merges in the admission that such railways will be built by private capital if the Government will give a land grant similar to that given to the Northern Pacific. We are told that private capital will gladly build a railroad from the Pacific coast of Alaska to the interior waterways if given one-half of the land for a distance of 40 miles on each side of the road. Now, if it be profitable for a private corporation to build the railways for one-half of the land in a 40-mile strip, why is it not a good business proposition for the Government to build a railway, as proposed, when it owns practically all of the land, not only for 40 miles along the proposed route but throughout all of Alaska?

This argument justifies railway construction in Alaska by the Government independent of the question as to whether such railroad will be profitable immediately or for many years to come. The road will be a profitable investment if it develops the land and makes available the resources of the Territory. Railroads are necessary for that purpose. It is perhaps true that 10,000 miles of railway will be necessary for the ultimate development of the Territory of Alaska, but it does not follow that the Government must build all of it. Our Government has assisted in building 5,500 miles of the Union Pacific, Central Pacific, and Northern Pacific in a region where there are now 55,000 miles of railway, all the rest of which was built without any assistance of the Government whatever. The same will be true in Alaska. Within five years after a Government railway The same will be is built to the Tanana River it is said there will be 50,000 people in the Tanana Valley. That will justify private capital in building railways along other routes, into the interior of Alaska, in the same way as railways were built in the region between the Great Lakes and Puget Sound, where four transcontinental railways were operating within 25 years after the first one was built, and only that first one, the Northern Pacific, received Government aid. So it will be in Alaska. I repeat, it is not a question of Government ownership of railways, not even in Alaska. It is a question of how best to provide facilities to develop the resources of that Territory. It is a question of whether we shall surrender a large portion of those resources to secure such railways, as was done in the Western States, or whether we shall build the railways ourselves to facilitate de-velopment. Then, when such railways are built and the development of the interior of Alaska assured, we can settle the Government railway question there on the same basis as in the States. I contend it will be immensely profitable for the Government to build the railways in Alaska just to secure the development of that Territory, just to make available the great natural resources of that Territory; and after we have done this we might, if so disposed, give the railways away and still profit immensely by the transaction in the light of our experience in the development of the great West.

THE VALUE OF ALASKA TO THE UNITED STATES.

Alaska is a land whose area is equal to one-fifth of the United States, or twelve times that of the State of New York. Its production of gold for the year 1912 was $17,398,943; that of our gold State, California, whose population is thirty-seven times as great, was only $19,928,500. Alaska's per capita production of copper, the mining of which is only begun, is now equal to the per capita production of Montana. It has coal fields of greater area than those of Pennsylvania, and arable lands greater than the entire State of Oregon. Tin, iron, gypsum, and oil are found in commercial quantities, and its marble quarries rival those of Vermont.

The reindeer industry, established in 1902 with 1,280 head, has spread until the 47 herds number 38,000 head, and promises to become a valuable source of food supply; while the extent of its fishing grounds exceed those of all the States combined, and are excelled nowhere in the world.

Its undeveloped water power exceeds that of the entire Pacific Coast

Its undeveloped water power exceeds that of the entire Pacific Coast

States.

Such is Alaska, a frontier land not only of vast resources, but a land also of scenic beauty and grandeur not excelled by any of those sought annually by the thousands who take their summer recreation abroad.

On an investment of $7,200,000, Alaska has given us in return, since 1867 (and by far the greater portion since 1809, or only 14 years), as shown in the reports of the United States Geological Survey, Director of the Mint, and other official documents: Gold, final estimate	1, 841, 202 13, 570, 225 347, 389 982, 554

This foreign gold and silver was practically all received at Skagway and thence experted.

With a population in 1910 of only 64,356, about equally divided between natives and whites, these figures show commerce per capita for entire population, $1,013; commerce per capita for white population, $2,026. No other country in the world can make such a showing.

These results have been obtained at a cost to the Government of about $25,000,000 over and above the revenues collected in 45 years, showing a profit to the Nation of practically $438,000,000 on an investment of $32,000,000. Contrast this with the money spent in the Philippines on an alien nation, and with the results which will not bear comparison. If Alaska has achieved so large a measure of success under adverse conditions of every kind, what may not the results be under more favorable auspices?

In March, 1867, Alaska was purchased by the United States for the sum of $7,200,000 in gold, and in October of the same year the formal transfer was made at Sitka. From 1867 to 1877 Alaska was governed by the War Department, although the customs were from the beginning collected by the Treasury Department, and with the latter the control rested from 1877 until the passage of the act of 1884. This act extended over Alaska the laws of the State of Oregon, so far as they were applicable, created a judicial district and a land district, put in force the mining laws of the United States, and gave the country an administrative system.

The influx of settlers after the discovery of gold in the Klondike in 1896 rendered more adequate laws necessary. In 1899 and 1900 Congress made provisions for a code of civil and criminal law, and in 1903 passed a homestead act. In the meantime a serious boundary dispute had arisen between the United States and Canada regarding the interpretation of the treaty of 1825. This was settled in 1903 by an agreement whereby the seacoast of Canada extended no farther north than 54° 40°.

By the act of May 7, 1906, Alaska was given power to elect a Delegate to Congress. The act of August 24, 1912, provided for the creation of a Territorial legislature.

GOVERNMENT.

EXECUTIVE.

The executive power is vested in the governor, who is appointed by the President for a term of four years by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The governor may veto any bill passed by the Territorial legislature within three days after it is presented to him. The bill must be vetoed within three days if the legislature continues in session; otherwise it becomes law without the governor's approval. The legislature may override the veto by a two-thirds vote of all the members to which each house is entitled.

LEGISLATIVE.

The legislative power is vested in a Territorial legislature consisting of a senate and a house of representatives. The senate consists of 8 members, 2 from each of the four judicial divisions into which Alaska is now divided. The house of representatives consists of 16 members, 4 from each of the four judicial divisions. The term of each member of the senate is four years, one member from each judicial division being elected every two years. The term of each member of the house of representatives is two years.

The first election for members of the legislature was held on November 5, 1912; subsequent elections will be held blennially thereafter on the Tuesday after the first Monday in November. The legislature will convene at Juneau, the capital, for the first session on March 3, 1913, and thereafter on the first Monday in March every two years. The length of the session is limited to 60 days, but the governor is empowered to call a special session, which shall not continue longer than 15 days.

District court.

The judicial power of the Territory is vested in the United States District Court for Alaska, which has the same jurisdiction as the district courts of the United States and has general jurisdiction in civil, criminal, equity, and admiralty causes. This court is divided into four divisions, presided over by four judges appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of four years.

LAND OFFICES.

Local land offices are located at Nome, Fairbanks, and Juneau, where entries for public lands should be filed. The surveyor general for the Territory is located at Juneau.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Citizens of the United States, or those who have declared their intention to become such, may settle upon and enter as a homestead claim not exceeding 320 acres of nonmineral, agricultural public land in Alaska. If unsurveyed, the land must be located in rectangular tracts, not more than 1 mile in length, with north and south, east and west boundaries marked upon the ground by permanent monuments, and notice of the claim filed in the recording district in which the land is situated. If at the expiration of the three-year period of residence and cultivation, or if at the end of 14 months' residence and cultivation the settler desires to commute a 160-acre claim, and the public-land surveys have not been extended over the land claimed, proof may be submitted, entry allowed, and patent obtained upon a survey made at the expense of the settler.

Corporations or citizens of the United States who are in the occupation of public lands in Alaska for the purposes of trade, manufacture, or other productive industry may each purchase at the price of $2.50 per acre one claim, not exceeding 80 acres in area, of nomineral public land needed and occupied for the purposes of trade, manufacture, or industry.

Deposits of mineral in the public lands and national forests in Alaska other than coal, oil, and natural gas are subject to location and purchase under the general mining laws of the United States by citizens, or those who have declared their intention to become citizens, at $2.50 per acre for placer-mining claims and at $5 per acre for lode-mining claims. Each lode-mining claim is limited in area to a tract not exceeding 1,500 feet in length by 600 feet in width, but the law imposes no limit as to the number of locations which may be made by a single individual or corporation. A placer-mining location in Alaska may not exceed 20 acres in area-for an individual location or 40 acres for an association of two or more persons, and no person is permitted to-locate, or to-procure to be located, for himself more than two placer-mining claims in any one calendar month.

Timber upon the unreserved public lands in Alaska is subject to sale under regulations issued pursuant to section 11 of the act of May 14, 1898 (30 Stat., 409).

The law provides for reservations of blocks of public lands 80 rods in width, between sold or entered tracts, along the shores of waters in Alaska, and various reservations of public lands or natural resources thereof have been made within that district.

Less than 1 per cent of the lands of Alaska are in private ownership. The people of the United States still own more than 99 per cent of the entire area of that vast Territory. It is a great national asset of the people, and it is evident to any student of the times that the people propose this asset shall be well administered. At least we must profit by the mistakes of the past. Land grants have proven to be both inadequate and inspections, methods of adding railway construction. In adding the state of the people propose the provention of the details of adding railway construction. insufficient methods of aiding railway construction. Inadequate because the lands have no practical value prior to the railway construction. They are not an asset of the railway until the road is actually in operation, and hence the bonds of the Northern Pacific, even with its tremendous land grants, sold at a deplorable discount. Land grants are unsatisfactory because in the end unreasonable profit is given to the railway, some years after its completion and when that aid is not necessary. This profit should be retained to the people. The financial condition of our country at the end of the Civil War was such that the Government was perhaps not justified in building the Pacific railroads. This may or may not be so, but it is not necessary now to determine that question. History has demonstrated that land grants are unwise, and we have had this experience in practically every State in the Union since railways became the accepted means of transportation. Nor do the people propose to turn over the resources of Alaska for exploitation by private capital. The Government can exploit these lands itself for the benefit of all the people. The proposed bond issue to build Government railways in Alaska is not for the benefit of the 35,000 people who are now in Alaska. money will not go to them, but will go to the people of the United States-to Pennsylvania for locomotives, to Minnesota and Colorado for steel rails, to the copper refineries on the Atlantic coast for copper wire, to the cotton fields of the South and the woolen mills of New England for clothing, and to the farmers throughout the entire United States for much of the food of the people who go there to build the railroads and to develop the resources and to establish homes in that great Territory. Our trade with Alaska is already greater than our trade with the Philippines or with China. What will it be when the population of Alaska is multiplied tenfold by our own people, for Alaska, in the future as in the past, will be peopled by the sons and daughters of every State in the Union. This land is the people's heritage. Its mines should fill their coffers and its fields supply their larders. It is simply a business proposition for the people of the United States to pledge their credit in the development of the resources of this Territory, instead of surrendering one-half or one-quarter of those resources to any private corporation for exploitation and profit.

RAILROADS.

The principal railroads in Alaska are the Alaska Northern, extending about 70 miles in a northerly direction from Seward, on Resurrection Bay, to Kern Creek; the Seward Peninsula, about 75 miles long, with its terminus at Nome; the Tanana Valley, extending from Fairbanks and Chena, about 50 miles among the principal placer-mining camps of the neighborhood; the White Pass & Yukon, extending in a northerly direction from Skagway a distance of 20 miles in American territory, and thence in Canadian territory to White Horse, a distance of about 90 miles; and the Copper River & Northwestern, extending 197 miles from Cordova to Kennicott. The first and last named are standard gauge.

from Cordova to Kennicott. The first and last named are standard gauge.

The act approved August 24, 1912 (public 334), provides for the appointment by the President of a rallroad commission consisting of an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Army, a geologist in charge of Alaskan surveys, an officer of the Engineer Corps of the Navy, and a civil engineer who has had practical experience in railroad construction. The members of this commission are as follows: Maj. Jay J. Morrow, chairman; Alfred H. Brooks, vice chairman; Civil Engineer Leonard M. Cox, and Collin Macrae Ingersoll.

This body was authorized and instructed to conduct an examination into the transportation question in the Territory of Alaska; to examine railroad routes from the seaboard to the coal fields and to the interior and navigable waterways; to secure surveys and other information with respect to railroads, including cost of construction and operation; to obtain information in respect to the coal fields and their proximity to railroad routes; and to make report to Congress, together with their conclusions and recommendations, in respect to the best and most available routes for railroads in Alaska which will develop the country and the resources thereof for the use of the people of the United States.

The report of this commission is a splendid argument for the construction of railways in Alaska by the Government. The report recommends the construction of two trunk lines from the coast to the interior, one following the Copper River Valley and the other the Susitna Valley. We are not interested now in the consideration of these routes, for the pending bill leaves the selection of the route entirely to the President. We are interested, however, in the advice and information given in that report. One member of the commission, the beloved Dr. Brooks, has personal knowledge of Alaska, acquired through his long experience in the United States Geological Survey and his intimate personal examination of the resources of the Territory. The other members of the commission visited Alaska. The commission availed themselves of the mass of information collected by the Government through its various departments. They not only found that the resources of Alaska justified railway construction, but also that such lines can be made profitable. The commission did not feel called upon to recommend how the railroad should be built, but the report recognizes that the Government can build such roads on 3 per cent money, while private capital must pay a much higher interest rate, unless the bonds for private construction be guaranteed by the Government. The report shows that on an estimated tonnage on a given route a passenger rate of 7.7 cents per mile and a freight rate of 9.4 cents per ton-mile would be necessary on private construction with 6 per cent money, as against a passenger rate of 6.6 cents per mile and a freight rate of 6.25 cents per tonmile under Government construction with 3 per cent money. This means that a private company, even if fortunate enough to sell its 6 per cent bonds at par, would be obliged to charge a passenger rate of $32,90 for the haul between Seward and Fairbanks, as against $28.20 on a Government-constructed line, and a freight rate over the same route of $40.20 per ton would be necessary, as against $26.71 on a Government-constructed line. I have selected this route merely to illustrate the point that the Government has great advantages in the construction of railroads in Alaska, by reason of its ability to do so on 3 per cent money, while if private construction be at all possible traffic charges would be much greater. These rates seem high, but we have it on the authority of Dr. Brooks, of the United States Geological Survey, that a freight rate of 10 cents per ton-mile would save perhaps one-half of the annual freight bill of from seven to eight million dollars paid by the people of interior Alaska on the present estimated total of 30,000 tons per annum. At this rate, the value to the people of Alaska, on the present tonnage alone, would be sufficient to retire in 11 years the entire bond issue proposed in the pending bill. Hence it follows that we can not only open up the vast resources of the Territory by the construction of the railways, but we can save the people of Alaska enough on the present freight traffic alone to more than justify the investment.

That, however, is a small item. The real purpose is to make available the great resources of the interior of Alaska. Acres of placer gravels, rich but not rich enough to pay to work under the present high transportation charges and the incidental cost of high labor and supplies, mines of native copper of such fabulous wealth as to rival the great Treadwell, which produces $4,000,000 each year, and the Kennicott, from which the Morgan-Guggenheims have already extracted several millions of dollars, though their railroad to it has been in operation but three years. These rich mines might as well be in the chasms of the moon until railway transportation is provided. I am told that a paying mine has never been found at tidewater anywhere on this old mother earth except in Alaska, yet practically all of the more than $240,000,000 which Alaska has produced in minerals came from places within sight of the smoke of a steamboat. This will give us but a faint idea of what the mineral production of Alaska will be when railway transportation makes available the mineral wealth of the great interior.

The mineral wealth is very generally admitted; indeed, it can not be denied by anyone who has given the subject any study. We are disposed to question the agricultural value of Alaska, however, because of its northern latitude. This is because we do not realize that there are 15,000,000 people in Europe living in the same latitude on substantially the same area, in Scotland, Norway, Sweden, Finland, Lapland, and northern Russia. Those countries produce no gold, their copper production, after centuries of development, is but a fraction of what Alaska already produces from the little rim along the southern coast. Their fisheries produce less than those of Alaska, although the Alaskan fisheries are far from being fully developed. The agricultural lands of Alaska are just as favorably situated as those of northern Europe, and in time will produce just as bountifully and sustain just as large a popu-

We have it from the figures compiled by the Department of Agriculture, and based on data collected by and through the investigations of the agricultural lands of the Territory by competent men. There are four agricultural experiment stations in Alaska conducted by the United States Government under the directions of Prof. C. C. Georgeson. These are located at Sitka, the ancient Russian capital of Alaska, situated in the southern archipelago; at Kodiak, on the southwestern coast of Alaska, the oldest town on the Pacific coast of America north of Mexico, which was settled by the Russians the year George Washington became President of the United States, and occupied ever since then by the Russians and their descendants, who till the soil and raise their herds upon this pastoral island, where the Government is now developing a breed of cattle suitable for domestic use in Alaska. Another station is at Rampart, on the Yukon, and another at Fairbanks, in the heart of the Tanana Valley, our great northern agricultural empire. This lies within 100 miles south of the Arctic Circle. It is true that the cold is severe, but no more so than in many of the most prolific agricultural regions in the northern portion of the United States. Sixty-five degrees below zero is the lowest temperature of which the United States Weather Bureau has any record in Fairbanks, Alaska. It is interesting to note that the same temperature has been recorded in Miles City, Mont., in the heart of the great agricultural section of eastern Montana. I append the following tables prepared upon data furnished by the United States Weather Bureau. The information given is official, and can be verified at the Weather Bureau in the United States Department of Agriculture.

Thus it will be seen that the coldest weather in the Tanana.

Thus it will be seen that the coldest weather in the Tanana Valley is no more severe than in portions of the United States where agriculture and stock raising has long been profitably pursued. It must be noted that this is in the Tanana Valley, the most northerly territory which will probably be reached by any Government railway authorized by this bill. The temperature along the southern coast of Alaska is as warm as that along the southern boundary of the United States, and it is to be noted that colder weather has been recorded in the capital of Florida than at Cordova, Alaska, the terminus of one of the proposed routes recommended by the Alaska Railway Commission. This is because of the influence of the Japan current in the Pacific Ocean, which produces the same effect upon the climate of Alaska as the Gulf Stream produces upon the climate of the British Isles and the Scandinavian countries. This warming influence is supplemented by the long days during the growing season in Alaska. In the Tanana Valley the growing season of 105.6 days, by which we mean the season between killing frosts, has more hours of sunlight than during the growing season in Iowa, New York, or New England. Then, too, the interior of Alaska is semiarid, and is a land of almost perpetual sunshine during the growing season. These climatic conditions, combined with the wonderful fertility of the soil, have already produced bountiful crops, in proof of which I quote literally from the Annual Report of the Alaska Experiment Station for 1912:

FAIRBANKS STATION.

This station has attracted much attention during the summer of 1912. Travelers from many parts of the globe registered at Fairbanks during the present calendar year, many of whom, after visiting the station, expressed their amazement upon seeing the fields of ripened grains, alfalfa, clover, vegetables, and flowers. The majority of people still think of Alaska as one great field of ice, and those who see the possibilities of agriculture unfolded before their eyes in one grand panorama, as displayed on the southern slope during the season of 1912, may well be surprised.

The latest visitors for the season were the honorable United States railroad commissioners, accompanied by the Hon. James Wickersham, Delegate to Congress from Alaska; Mr. Falcon Joslin, president of the Tannan Valley Railroad; also a number of prominent Alaska citizens. At this late date—October 12—the crops were already harvested and stored for the winter. There had been no snow at that date, nor was the ground frozen. The yard was still a profusion of flowers, and the clover lawns were green as in midsummer. The crops were exhibited as well as possible, and the visitors were shown several tons of ripened grain in the sheaf and stack, as well as 3,000 pounds which had already been fiatled out. They were shown through the large cellar, where more than 1,000 bushels of potatoes of 16 varieties were stored.

It has been stated that upon their return to Fairbanks the railroad commissioners announced that they would not dare to tell what they had seen in Alaska when they returned home, for the people would not believe them.

The season of 1912 has been the banner year thus far, and like reports had seen in Alaska when they returned home, for the people believe them.

The season of 1912 has been the banner year thus far, and like reports are coming from all over the Tanana Valley.

Two church Sunday-school picnics were held at the station in the birch grove on the hill above the cottage during the summer, which afforded some 300 of the Fairbanks citizens the pleasure of visiting the station. On both occasions the general theme of expression was, What a beautiful place! What wonderful crops!

CLIMATIC CONDITIONS.

It has been said that the climatic condition of a country is one of the first attributes to be considered when a change in habitation is contemplated, but perhaps opportunity is even more important to the man in very moderate circumstances, who can not live on climate alone. Every country has some drawbacks, among them undesirable weather conditions; it is usually too cold, too hot, too wet, too sickly, or even all of these conditions exist in one locality. Interior Alaska has its cold winters, but the summers are not too warm, nor seldom too wet, and, with proper cultivation, seldom too dry. There are few, if, indeed, any other, localities on the globe which can boast of a more healthful climate.

any other, localities on the gione which can be climate. The last winter here was the mildest known to white man. The temperature ranged along about -10° to -20° F, with a great deal of the time at or above zero. The temperature fell to -34° F, one day in November, -45° F, one day in December, -42° F, one day in January, and -32° F one day in February. The snowfall was rather light, and very little fell during the early part of the winter. Freighters were compelled to use wagons until December.

Red Fife wheat seeded May 1 began heading July 3. It had sufficiently ripened to cut on September 10. It made a thick, even growth 4 feet tall and yielded about 55 bushels per acre.

Romanow wheat seeded May 1 began heading July 4. It ripened with Red Fife. The grain stood 4½ feet tall, very even and thick throughout the plat. This variety gave a yield of 60 bushels per acre. Wild Goose wheat seeded May 2 began heading July 4. It ripened a few days later than the above varieties, stood 5 feet tall, very even and thick throughout the plat, and indicated a yield equally as heavy as Romanow.

and thick throughout the plat, and indicated a yield equally as heavy as Romanow.

The fall proved so cool and damp that these three varieties were cut and hung up in a shed to dry out and harden. The grain is well filled with plump kernels.

Sixty Day oats seeded May 2 began heading June 28. They made a thick, even growth about 3 feet tall, were ripe enough to cut August 10, and yielded about 85 bushels per acre.

Finnish oats seeded May 10 began heading July 4, and were ripe for cutting August 15. The crop was very heavy, standing 4 to 5½ feet tall. This variety yielded at the rate of about 90 bushels per acre.

Beardiess barlet all, and were ready to cut August 15. This variety gave a yield of 100 bushels per acre.

Beardiess barley (No. 19852) seeded May 3 began heading June 26. It made a heavy growth 4 feet tall, was ready to cut August 10, and 172n thrashed yielded 50 bushels to the acre.

Hull-less barley (No. 19851) seeded May 3 began heading June 25, made a thick, even growth 3½ feet tall, was ready to cut August 10, and yielded 42 bushels of 60 pounds each per acre.

The above grains were seeded with a No. 4 Planet Jr. drill on a south hillside which had been cropped to potatoes the two years previous. The tract is birch timberland cleared three years ago. No fertilizers were used on this tract, neither on the potatoes nor on the grain, but it probably represents the best soil and exposure.

Plats of alfalfa, red, white, and alsike clover were seeded about the yard fronting the cottage during the first week in June after the main crops were all in the ground and the yard laid out. These plats were fertilized with stable manure and sodium nitrate. The alfalfa-covered a plat 24 by 48 feet. It came up very quickly and made more than a 2-foot growth, standing very thick on the ground. It began blossoming about the middle of August and doubtless would have made a light second crop if cut then. Visitors coming in quite frequently, the alfalfa was left standing until late in September. After it was cut for feed, the stubble had made some new growth when the snow fell.

The red clover covered a plat 36 by 48 feet, making a very thick stand. The summer growth was a little over 2 feet high, and this plat was red with blossoms from the middle of August until cut for feed late in September. This plat was also left standing all fall, being much admired by the visitors.

The alsike clover covered a plat 15 by 20 feet and made a very thick growth 2 feet high. It was also cut for feed with the red clover. Both plats were turning quite green before the ground froze.

The white clover occupied two small plats fringed with pansies, China asters, and China pinks. The white clover covered the ground thickly with about 8 inches of growth, which was almost hidden under its blossoms.

Field peas were grown this year by some of the settlers, and they report that they are well pleased with results. They have not been tried at the station.

Other green manuring crops, such as buckwheat and rye, promise to be more suitable here, as either of these will afford a fair crop to turn under by August 1.

The potato crop of 1912 has by far excelled that of previous years all throughout the Tanana Valley as far as reported. The yield in Fairbanks and the immediate vicinity, it is estimated, will total upward of 300 tons. The tubers in nearly every instance are superior in quality to those of other years. The prejudice against the native potatoes is being gradually broken down, and it is probable that in two or three years the native potatoes will control the market, if, indeed, imported potatoes are not excluded entirely. As the farmer here extends his clearings he is enabled to enlarge his crops, and not only produce more but also cheapen the cost of production so that he can sell potatoes for 3 cents a pound and still make a handsome profit. The dealers can no longer afford the risk of disposing of their imported stock, which will cost them at least 5 cents, to say nothing about the loss by shrinkage, which is much greater than on the native product. The station crop for 1912 amounted to about 1,000 bushels of marketable size, and probably 5 tons of small rotatoes and culis from a little over 5 acres. (Pl. VIII, fig. 1.) The small tubers found a ready market at 1½ cents to 2 cents per pound before the recent hog epidemic struck the camp.

Sixteen varieties of potatoes were planted from May 14 to 22. (Pl. VIII, fig. 2.) The greater part of the crop, however, was of the varieties Eureka and Gold Coin.

The experimental plat was on ground cultivated for the third year, being in potatoes the two previous years. The ground was fertilized for the first time with old stable manure for this crop. Each variety was planted on May 14 in rows 40 feet long, the seed dropped and covered by hand 1 foot apart in the row, making 40 hills of each variety was planted on May 14 in rows 40 feet long, the seed dropped and covered by hand 1 foot apart in the row, making 40 hills of each variety was planted on May 14 in rows 40 feet long, the seed dropped and covered by hand 1 foot apart in the row, making 40 hills of each variety and

(1) Butkee, a local product; white skin, rather large, oblong and quite regular in shape, deep eyes, and cooks quite dry. The yield was at the rate of 478 bushels per acre.

(2) Irish Cobbler; white skin, rather large, oblong and quite regular in shape, medium deep eyes, and cooks quite dry. The yield was at the rate of 423 bushels per acre.

(3) Gold Coin; white skin, medium size, round and somewhat flattened, quite regular in shape, small eyes, and cooks quite dry. The yield was at the rate of 375 bushels per acre.

(4) Eureka; white skin, medium to large size, round and slightly flattened, quite regular in shape, small eyes, and cooks quite dry. The yield was at the rate of 345 bushels per acre.

(5) Vornhem; white skin, medium large, oblong, irregular in shape, deep eyes, and cooks medium dry. The yield was at the rate of 314 bushels per acre.

(6) Garfield; white skin, medium size and oblong in shape, some what irregular with many knotty or little side tubers, deep eyes, and cooks quite dry. The yield was at the rate of 302 bushels per acre.

(7) Burpee Early; red skin, medium in size, oblong and quite regular in shape, small eyes, and cooks quite dry. The yield was at the rate of 302 bushels per acre.

(8) Early Ohio; red skin, medium large in size, oblong and irregular in shape with many knotty or little side tubers, rather deep eyes, cooks only fair to medium dry. The yield was at the rate of 302 bushels per acre.

(9) Freeman; white skin, medium large in size, oblong and irregular in shape with many knotty or little side tubers, rather deep eyes, cooks only fair to medium dry. The yield was at the rate of 302 bushels per acre.

(10) Extra Early Pioneer; white skin, medium large, round and per acre.

(10) Extra Early Pioneer; white skin, medium large, round and quite regular in shape, rather deep eyes, cooks quite dry. The yield was at the rate of 278 bushels per acre.

(11) Snowflake; white skin, medium large, oblong and irregular in shape, deep eyes, and cooks medium dry. The yield was at the rate of 272 bushels per acre.

(12) White Mammoth; large round and oblong tubers with quite deep eyes and regular in shape, cooks only fair to medium dry. The yield was at the rate of 254 bushels per acre.

per acre. (14) Early Market; light pink skin, medium small, round, a little rough with deep eyes, cooks quite dry. The yield was at the rate of 242 bushels per acre.

(15) Bovee; pink skin, medium in size and round in shape, with small eyes, and cooks quite dry. The yield was at the rate of 206 bushels per acre.

(16) White Beauty; rather large round tubers with small eyes, cooks medium dry. The yield was at the rate of 194 bushels per acre.

Considering the market values of the above varieties, or rather such a class of potatoes as those which find preference in the market; the smoothest white-skinned varieties which are good cookers would be selected. Alaska-grown potatoes are not as dry and mealy as outside potatoes, and oftentimes some varieties become watery when cooked on some soils the whole crop is watery and unfit for table use. This accounts for the strong prejudice against the native product.

In cooking samples of the 16 varieties grown at this station for the season of 1912 not a single watery potato was found, although those classed as "medium dry" were not far from it.

Some of the red-skinned varieties are the best cookers, but these do not sell readily because of the color of the skin.

The quality and the yield of potatoes differ materially with the season, so that several years of comparison are necessary to arrive with any degree of exactness at the relative values of different varieties.

This is the first season the many little side tubers on the Freeman and Garfield varieties have been noticed. Some very large tubers have prongs, and sometimes clusters of small side tubers firmly connected to the large tuber, rendering them unsalable.

For market purposes, Gold Coin, Eureka, Irish Cobbler, and Butkee varieties are preferred to the other 12 varieties, and these, by the way, were the heaviest yielders in 1912. The Gold Coin and Eureka is potato on the list.

Based on cooking qualities only, departing from color preference, selections would be made as follows:

Early Ohio, Burpee Early, Extra Early Ohio, and Bovee, of the red or pink skinned varieties. Next, the Gold Coin, Eureka, Irish Cobbler, and the Butkee. Some of the others are close seconds to the Prof. Georgeson is so well satisfied with potato culture about Fairbanks that little attention will be given that tuber hereafter at that station. The agricultural experiment station is not intended to compete with farmers, and the farms about Fairbanks are now successful. Indeed, they are producing at less cost than at the Government station, where very properly the cultivation is experimental and hence more expensive in many cases. The local market at Fairbanks now consumes about 400 tons, and the farms produce about 300 tons. will soon supply the entire local demand. When transportation is provided, the Fairbanks farms will have a market in the newer mining camps, and farming in the Tanana Valley will assume that permanency which is essential to any agricultural The success attained is indeed remarkable. Faircommunity. banks already produces more potatoes per capita than many potato-growing States. What other pioneer district can show such a record in advance of railway transportation or other assurance of permanency?

Reference has been made in these debates to the cost of $200 per acre for clearing lands for the agricultural experimental station at Fairbanks. The same report recites that this was done with labor costing $7.50 per day for eight hours' work. That was the prevailing rate of wages then paid at Fairbanks during the busy summer season. I am reliably informed that the tract selected contained a fine body of growing timber, and was chosen because of its close proximity to the town of Fairbanks. It was not cleared as agricultural lands are universally cleared. The Government wished to establish an experiment station. It wished to do so immediately. It wished that sta-tion located near the town of Fairbanks for obvious reasons. It was not then demonstrating how cheaply the land could be cleared, but the director was very properly hastening to place the station in operation. It is not fair to illustrate the cost of land clearing in the Tanana Valley by this single instance. We all know that no farmer in the United States would think of hiring labor to clear his land during the harvest season, when labor is scarce and commanding the highest wage. Yet that was done in this case, with the added circumstance that the Government employees are limited to eight hours' work a day. Then, too, I am reliably informed that growing timber was removed and the green stumps grubbed and burned, roots were chopped out, and the ground plowed immediately.

This is not the usual method of land clearing. We all know that it costs a railway many times as much to clear its right of way as it costs the farmer to clear the land through which the railroad passes. Then, too, it is seldom that timberlands are first cleared in any agricultural district. There is always plenty of available ground which is more cheaply cleared, and that is always selected by the pioneer farmer. I am told by those who have lived in those regions of Alaska that the greater part of the land is covered by a so-called tundra of moss, leaves, and vegetation, which decays less rapidly in this northern semiarid climate. This tundra is several inches deep. It dries during the summer months, and the drying can be facilitated by digging trenches through it, which is often done with a plow, and that later in the season this tundra burns readily, thus removing practically all of the surface débris, destroying the brush and small trees, and making the ground practically ready for the plow, while the ash improves the soil and places it in better shape for cultivation than if the débris were plowed under. A few years are required to tame such soils, and the best crops can not be expected until the ground has been tilled a few years. The result is that the farms around Fairbanks are yielding better crops and a better quality of produce each succeeding year. Agricultural permanency in that valley will be assured when we have railroad transportation. No doubt the farmers in the Tanana Valley will share many of the trials common to all Tanana Valley will share many of the trials common to all pioneer farmers, and no doubt they will also ultimately triumph, as did the pioneer farmers of New England, of Ohio, of the Mississippi Valley, and of the far West. Our duty to these pioneers is to afford them every encouragement by liberal laws and adequate transportation facilities. Well has Secretary Lane said in his last annual report, "I do not believe we sufficiently reward the pioneer." Certainly the pioneer has not been rewarded in Alaska. He has not even been encouraged. The passage of this bill will be one move in the direction of substantial sage of this bill will be one move in the direction of substantial encouragement.

The fisheries of Alaska have yielded more than $167,000,000, including the output of 1912, and to this must be added the output of approximately $18,000,000 in 1913. The bulk of this is canned salmon. The halibut industry is quite well developed, while cod fishing has only begun. The waters of Alaska doubt-less contain more fish than all other American waters combined, and some idea of the future value of the fisheries may be obtained from the statement that of over 250 varieties of food fish in Alaskan waters we are utilizing only 7.

The seal rookeries of Alaska have yielded more than $52,-000,000 worth of sealskins. Furs have been exported from Alaska of a value exceeding $22,000,000, and the whaling industry is important, the value thus taken amounting in 1912 alone to $1,444,084.

Alaska is the hunters' paradise, abounding in all kinds of wild game indigenous to the northland. The bird life is especially interesting, as Alaska is the breeding place for millions of geese, brant, duck, and waterfowl of innumerable variety, as well as grouse, ptarmigan, and other game birds. mountain sheep, and mountain goat are numerous, and it is the northern home of the moose, while the caribou is seen in thousands in their annual trek across the northern plains.

The domestic caribou-called the reindeer-now number over 38,000 in Alaska. These hardy and useful animals thrive upon the moss-covered mountains and waste lands of western and northern Alaska, which it is estimated will support 20,000,000 head of reindeer. Already several hundred reindeer carcasses are exported each year, and reindeer meat is not only the principal winter supply of meat at Nome, but reindeer steaks are quite commonly served in the restaurants of Seattle and other Pacific coast cities. In time the reindeer will provide a great meat supply, as they thrive best in the winter upon the native mosses, but at present there is no means of practical transportation to get these animals to the market. The reindeer is also valuable for its milk and hide. In Lapland, on an area of 14,000 square miles, over 26,000 people are sustained in comfort by their reindeer, amounting to about 400,000. The so-called waste lands of Alaska might sustain 50 times that number. and at that rate provide sustenance for a population of 5,000,000 people. Can any other region in all the world indicate such vast possibilities in the use of its waste lands as this region of western and northernmost Alaska?

After all, however, Alaska is chiefly important to us for its marvelous wealth of mineral. Well has it been named the "treasure land." The so-called Seward ice chest of 40 years ago now proves to be Uncle Sam's golden coffer. Development work now in actual operation at Juneau alone will provide an annual yield of more than $30,000,000 from that one mining district, with an insured ore supply in sight sufficient to maintain that production for 150 years. Improved transportation facilities with cheaper cost of labor and supplies will make possible the development of immense areas of placer ground in the interior which can not now possibly be worked. Forty dredges are in operation at Nome on Bering Sea, where water transare in operation at Nome on Bering Sea, where water trans-portation is available five months in each year. But better railway facilities are necessary, and any reasonable estimate of future productions would seem extravagant, even when based on statements made by those so conservative as the Geological Survey.

Copper mining is at present limited to the islands along the southern and southeastern coast of Alaska. Only one copper mine in the interior of Alaska is provided with railway transportation, and that mine has actually paid over $3,000,000 in dividends in its less than three years of operation. This great production along the coast is but a slight indication of the pos sible production when railway transportation is provided. But an important factor is the necessity for coke for smelting. At present foreign coke, even from Australia, is used largely in smelting Alaska copper ore, while the coal fields of Alaska contain countless tons of the most suitable coal for coke manu-An assured supply of Alaska coke at a reasonable cost would insure the construction of numerous copper smelting and matting plants along the Alaskan coast, where there is an infinite variety of ores which are suitable for blending in a proper smelter. Then, too, flux will not be necessary, as it is in most smelters throughout the United States, owing to the character of the ores. This, however, will not be possible until railroads are provided and the coal fields are opened to development.

The surveyed coal fields of Alaska cover an area estimated by the United States Geological Survey at 12,667 square miles, but only one-fifth of Alaska has been inspected. Very little of this has even been prospected. The two best-known fields of high-grade coal are the Bering River and Matanuska fields, in both of which considerable development work has been done and some coal extracted. The chemical tests as reported by the United States Geological Survey show the coal from those two fields to be equal in quality to that of Pennsylvania and West Virginia, each field containing deposits of anthracite and very high grades of bituminous steaming coal and areas of the most desirable coals for the manufacture of coke. The withdrawal of these coal fields from entry has prevented their development. I am not now discussing the wisdom of these withdrawals, but the statement is necessary to explain why Alaska has been compelled to buy its coal in foreign countries and that even the Government is purchasing Australian coal for its use in Alaska and is having the same delivered into Government bunkers on the Alaskan coast in Norwegian steamers. The great value of Alaska coal is not only for its use in Alaska, but elsewhere. About this there is no question. Another great demand for this coal is in the manufacture of coke for copper smelters and steel manufacturing. There is no other coking coal of such quality on the Pacific coast of North America, and this coal must be made available before the copper industry of Alaska can be properly developed.

The value of this steaming coal for naval use is, however, questioned in these debates. It appears that no naval test has ever been made of the Matanuska fields, and no satisfactory test has been made of the Bering River coal, although Congress provided for such a test more than a year ago. About 1,000 tons of coal from the Matanuska field has been mined and will be brought out by sleds during the present winter. Some coal was obtained last year from the Bering River fields. It was the test of this coal about which the opponents to this bill made so much argument on the floor of this House a few days ago. The naval report of this coal test admits that it was not a fair test, that the coal was not properly selected, and contained much dirt and slate. The fact is that the citizens of Katalla, Alaska, publicly protested when this coal was brought out. Their statements were then published in the newspapers of Alaska and the Pacific coast to the effect that the coal had been carelessly selected and that much dirt and slate had been included with it. I refer especially to the statement of Thomas G. White, as published in the Seattle newspapers many months before the naval test was made. Mr. White then gave warning that this test would not prove satisfactory because of the improper and careless selection of the coal. charge is that the coal was taken from the face of several cuts made by coal locators several years previous. Naturally the rain and weather had largely destroyed the exposure. In order to obtain a fair sample other and further development work should have been done so as to obtain coal which had not been exposed to the weather, as this was for several years. does not appear to have been done, and the results of the tests are far superior to what would have been expected by those who read Mr. White's statement made at the time the coal was taken out and months before the test was made. However, this was not the first test of the Alaskan coal. Commander Boyd, of the United States Navy, in his testimony before the Senate Committee on Territories on May 19, 1913, makes this statement on page 141.

Mr. Boyd. We have had just one test of that coal some years ago. About 35 tons were brought from Mr. McDonald's mine in the same field, was brought to Puget Sound and put on board the Nebraska. The Nebraska then went to sea and made 24-hour tests, steaming four boilers, two boilers using Pocahontas coal and the other two using Berling River coal. The result of that test, so far as figures go, indicates the Berling River coal is superior to the Pocahontas coal as 18 to 15, so far as value is concerned, but that is a very misleading sort of test. Two of those boilers may have been providing most of the steam, just as two horses in a four-horse team may do most of the work; so the test shows nothing. It did show that the coal can not be worked very readily on the grate. For instance, it was so slack that if the fireman, following his usual practice in leveling the top of the fire with a hoe, strikes the slice bar in breaking up clinkers, if he follows that same practice, he is likely to lose a lot of the coal through the grate. We have a commander of the Maryland, who is well informed on Alaska affairs, and is very much interested in the experiment and knows fully the result of that test, and he will make an effort to have his engineer and his fireman so trained by the time they get the coal on board at Controller Bay that they will know best by what system this coal should be fired to make the best test.

Now, I contend that neither of these tests are fair or depend-

Now, I contend that neither of these tests are fair or dependable. Naturally surface tests are not reliable. Coal for naval use must meet the most exacting demand and must be carefully selected. The chemical tests of the Alaska coal show it to be all that could be desired, and it ought not to be con-demned upon a sample of coal selected from one place, which had been exposed for several years to the action of the rain and weather, especially as the naval officers themselves admit this test to be unfair.

Tin occurs in Alaska on the Seward Peninsula and in the Hot Springs region of the Tanana Valley, both as placer or stream tin and in lodes or veins.

In view of the enormous amount of tin plate used by the cannery establishments on the Pacific coast, the success of these mines is of deep interest. The official report of the commerce of Alaska gives the value of tin ore exported in 1912 as $90,831.

Iron is abundant at several points in the Territory, but not in localities where it can be made valuable under present conditions. The quantity is said to be large and the quality excellent. If opened, the field might offer return cargo for the vessels now returning light from Nome.

Small pebbles of cinnabar occur in the sluice boxes in the north portion of the Copper River Valley and elsewhere in Alaska, and they may ultimately be a source of profit. Lead is found in the Ketchikan district.

High-grade antimony is reported from several localities, but in the absence of smelting facilities the ores have but little present value. Bismuth and tungsten are also recorded, and platinum is found in small quantities in the sluice boxes of many placer camps. It is interesting to note that a belt of rock of the same age geologically as those which yield the platinum placers of Russia is indicated on a late map of the Geological Survey as crossing the edge of the Tulsak, suggesting that the presence of the platinum in the sluice boxes may prove to be a fact of commercial value, especially as the metal now commands about $40 an ounce, or double the value of gold.

Silver also is found in nearly all the different quartz regions of Alaska and often is of sufficient value to pay for the reduction of the ore for the more valuable minerals which are being treated.

The number of fur-bearing animals in Alaska is undoubtedly much smaller than in the days of Russian occupation. The annual output of skins is still an important industry, the total value to 1912 being $22,216,872 and the value for 1913, $370,519.

While the marble industry is still in its infancy, those who are familiar with the quality and quantity of marble of Alaska are now preparing to supply the market, not only for interiors of buildings on the Pacific coast, but also to export it to Asia and even as far as Australia.

Gypsum is also found in large quantities.

That stock can be raised from the Yukon Valley southward during the summer is well known to all old Alaskans, who have seen cattle, sheep, and horses living on the native product. Cows for dairy purposes are kept near all the principal towns. On Raspberry Island there is a band of 500 sheep. Horses are in universal use in all parts of the Territory, their more extensive use being limited principally by the absence of good roads.

That eats, barley, and rye can be grown successfully has been demonstrated at the experimental stations in the Yukon and Tanana Valleys, as well as in that of the Copper River, and also by the farmers around Fairbanks and in the Susitna Valley, who have cut harley for hay giving 3 tons to the acre. There are also splendid samples of wheat. These crops are also largely grown in northern Russia. The successful growth is governed by the date at which the ground obtains a certain warmth to cause the seed to germinate—42° for wheat—and a sufficient time thereafter to mature.

It is possible to grow vegetables in all parts of Alaska except upon the tundra and the high mountains. An examination of the Government experimental station reports shows conclusively that all the ordinary garden vegetables can be raised with entire success.

Fruits and flowers abound in southeastern Alaska, while cranberries, raspberries, blueberries, and many other varieties of wild berries and flowers are to be found all through the Yukon and Tanana Valleys.

FORESTS The following statements are condensed from the official report of R. S. Kellogg, assistant forester in 1910, the report of the governor of Alaska for the fiscal year ending June 31, 1912, and from local sources where they relate to the Fairbanks mining industries.

The total area of the forests and woodlands in the Territory is estimated at about 100,000,000 acres, or 156,250 square miles, or 27 per cent of the total area. Of this about 20,000,000 acres, or 31,250 square miles, are estimated as containing timber suitable for manufacturing purposes, which is more than the area of South Carolina and nearly that of Maine or Indiana. Of the remaining 80 per cent, or 125,000 square miles, one-half is classed as woodland, carrying some saw timber, but on which the forest trees are of a small size, more scattered, and valuable chiefly for fuel; the tree growth on the remainder being stunted, scrubby, and valueless for any purpose except the camp fires of the prospector. The region north of the Endicott Mountains, all of the shores of Bering Sea, and the Alaska Peninsula south of Illiamna Lake are practically destitute of timber, producing nothing larger than willows of very small growth, and those only in a few localities. AREA

The matter of the construction of the railroad is to be left in the hands of the President. He is authorized under the provisions of the bill to do all lawful acts necessary to accomplish the purposes and objects of the measure. He is authorized to withdraw, locate, and dispose of, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, such area or areas of the public domain along the line or lines of proposed railroads for townsite purposes as he may from time to time designate.

In that a bond issue for $35,000,000 is authorized by the act, no appropriation is required. The act provides for a redemption fund, into which shall be paid 50 per cent of all moneys derived from the sale or disposal of any of the public lands, including town sites in Alaska, or the coal or mineral therein contained or the timber thereon; into this fund shall be paid the net earnings of the said railroads above maintenance charges and operating expenses; the said redemption fund, or any part thereof, shall be used from time to time, upon the order of the President, to pay the interest on the bonds authorized and issued under the provisions of the pending bill, and to redeem, cancel, and retire said bonds, under such rules and regulations as the President may establish in accordance with the provisions of this act.

The officers or agents placed in charge of the work by the President shall make to the President annually, or at such other periods as may be required, full and complete reports of their acts and of all moneys received and expended in the construction of the work, and the annual reports shall be transmitted by the President to Congres

The railroad rates will be under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The bill provides for the construction, maintenance, and operation of telegraph and telephone lines as far as they may be necessary and convenient in the construction and operation of the railroad authorized under the act, and they shall perform generally all the usual duties of telegraph and telephone lines for hire.

Alaska is owned by the United States Government. Rightfully it should be preserved for all the people. The day of special interests is rapidly coming to a close, and it becomes more apparent than ever that the resources of the great, rich Alaskan Territory should not be subservient to private interests, but of right should be conserved and developed for the welfare of the whole people.

It is because I believe that the proposed legislation will surely be a benefit to this Government and its people that I favor this bill. No clearer or more forceful statement of the whole situation has been made than was given in the words of our President in a recent message to this House, when he said:

A duty faces us with regard to Alaska which seems to me very pressing and very imperative; perhaps I should say a double duty, for it concerns both the political and the material development of the Territory. The people of Alaska should be given the full Territorial form of government, and Alaska, as a storehouse, should be unlocked. One key to it is a system of railways. These the Government should itself build and administer, and the ports and terminals it should itself control in the interest of all who wish to use them for the service and development of the country and its people.

[Applause.] Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I am led to support this bill after giving the subject of Alaska and its resources very careful study and consideration for two years.

In the Sixty-second Congress I was permitted to serve on the Committee on Territories, and was placed upon the subcommittee having in charge legislation touching Alaska. I may say that when I commenced the investigation of the subject I was opposed to conservation in Alaska as it was then and is now carried on, and opposed to railroad building in Alaska, because I had the idea that if we opened the coal mines of Alaska the people would at once flock into that country and it would be settled up as rapidly as the Territories of the West were settled.

After studying the matter very thoroughly I have come to the conclusion that the only way in which to develop Alaska is for the Government to build railroads there. [Applause.] I know no other way to secure those railroads than to support the bill that the Committee on Territories have brought into this House and now ask us to support.

Gentlemen say, "If you will open up the coal mines alone and build no railroads you will develop Alaska"; and my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] wound up a long speech by saying that the way to develop Alaska was to open the coal mines; that once open, the coal mines and the people would flock into the Territory. But for three hours he had been maintaining that there was not anything in the Territory to support a man after he got there. He labored long to prove conclusively that they could not even eat the potatoes that they raised there, that they had to ship potatoes in. Down in my friend's own that they had to ship potatoes in. Down in my friend's own home they are eating potatoes to-day grown up in Minnesota and Idaho and Colorado. That is no sign that you can not raise potatoes in Oklahoma good enough for the people of Oklahoma to eat. It is merely a case where they did not raise enough and have to send somewhere else to get them.

The gentleman from Oklahoma read from the statement of some gentleman named Chubbock, or some such name, a dissertation on the potato. If the gentleman had taken the pains to read the report of the experiment station, by Prof. Georgeson, who has spent four or five years in Alaska, he could have learned that they raise as good potatoes and as many of them per acre as they do in any country in the world.

Now, I do not believe that Alaska will ever be the agricultural country that Oklahoma, or Kansas, or Nebraska, or Missouri, or Illinois is, but I do believe that they can produce sufficient to support a population of 5,000,000. I know there are great mineral resources there, and, from my standpoint, I believe it is the duty of Congress to develop Alaska in some way in order that we may get the advantage of those resources. [Applause.]

As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Sims] said, Alaska belongs to the United States. It belongs to the people. We are not pledging ourselves to any doctrine of government ownership of public utilities, railroads, or anything else by building this railroad. We are doing with our property what any good business man would do with his own property. [Applause.] Suppose a farmer has 160 acres of timberland. Does it do him any good until he improves it? If he lets the timber stand and does not cut it off and put the land into cultivation, if he keeps it in his family long enough, it will break the whole family, because it is not improved and he gets no return for the outlay and taxes on the land. But when he begins improving it, it costs him something to improve it. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT] said in his speech that it costs $200 an acre to improve land in Alaska. Then his colleague [Mr. Ferris] in his speech dropped $75 an acre and got it down to $125 an acre.

I have seen a statement from a gentleman as intelligent as anybody who ever visited Alaska, who, after having inspected it, says it can be improved for $40 an acre. I do not know which one of these gentlemen is right, and I do not care which one is right. I believe it is the duty of this country to build railroads in Alaska, and especially do I believe it is the duty of the Members on this side of the Chamber to vote for this bill, and I will tell you why. We are responsible for the President of the United States. We ought to carry out his views. We ought to aid him in every way we can. We ought to carry out the pledges of our platform to develop Alaska. The President, in the first message he delivered to this Congress, told us how we ought to do it. Now, let us see just what he says:

A duty faces us with regard to Alaska which seems to me very pressing and very imperative; perhaps I should say a double duty, for it concerns both the political and the material development of the Territory. The people of Alaska should be given the full territorial form of government, and Alaska, as a storehouse, should be unlocked.

My friend the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Saunders] says there are a good many old storehouses all over the country that are not worth unlocking. President Wilson continues:

One key to it is a system of railways. These the Government should itself build and administer, and the ports and terminals it should itself control, in the interest of all who wish to use them for the service and development of the country and its people.

Now, my Democratic friends, that is the language of our President, and he is supported by the report of Mr. Lane, the Secretary of the Interior, who recommends the passage of this bill without any ifs or ands about it.

Now, what are we to do about it? Are we to keep our pledges solemnly made to the American people and aid our President in carrying out his views on this subject or are we to abandon the pledges we made to the people? Are we to disregard the recommendations of the President and excuse ourselves by saying it pledges us to Government ownership of railroads? What is the difference between digging a canal for transportation and owning it and making it free of tolls and building a railroad for transportation purposes? My good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore] wants this Government to dig an intercoastal canal, as it is called, all the way from Boston to Galveston, digging it three-fourths of the way in sight of the Atlantic Ocean and the Gulf of Mexico, and making it free of tolls to the commerce of the country. Everyone who favors that idea ought to be more than willing to vote for this bill to permit the Government to build a railroad in Alaska when we propose to charge everybody who rides on it or takes a pound of freight over it enough for the use of it to pay the expenses of maintaining the property. [Applause.]

for the road. How? Out of Government property there, out of the gold and the copper and everything else that is there, because it belongs to the American people; and out of the very things that my friend from Oklahoma said would furnish, if the road was built by private parties, an immense tonnage to the railroad if it would only open the coal mines,

A good deal has been said about the coal not being good for naval purposes. The gentlemen when they discuss this proposition ought to go to the bottom of it. They ought to get at the bottom of the coal proposition; they ought to know exactly what there is in it. There has been a strife between the Bureau of Mines, the Geological Survey, and the Navy Department over the coal in Alaska ever since it was known that there was coal up there.

The Bureau of Mines, some years ago, tested the coal from Alaska taken from Bering River coal fields, and it tested better than any eastern coal for naval purposes. Somehow or other that did not suit the Navy. For some reason they wanted to find out what the eastern owners of coal mines wanted. I do not know why, but there was some inducement somewhere that led the people interested to have another test, and so the naval appropriation bill in the last Congress, when it came to the House, carried $50,000 to enable the Navy to get coal out of Bering River coal fields in order that another test might be made. That appropriation was stricken out in the House for a good reason, but it went to the other end of the Capitol and they added $25,000 to it, making $75,000; and I am informed that when it got into conference there was no objection to it on the part of the House conferees, notwithstanding the House had stricken it out. I say there is as good coal in Alaska for naval purposes as there is in West Virginia or Pennsylvania, and I say that the coal taken for the test at Annapolis, and made on the Maryland, was taken for the express purpose of defeating the Bremmerton test before mentioned.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman want to indict the Navy Department?

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman heard what I said.
Mr. FERRIS. That shows the character of this debate.
Every time an authority is quoted there is a disposition to detract from that authority.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma ought to be the last one in the House to say that.

Mr. BOOHER. I have said nothing to which the gentleman can object. I say that the test made by the Navy Department was not a true test; that the coal obtained was obtained for the express purpose of destroying the test made at Bremmerton. Otherwise, how would you get two tests so far apart as those two tests were?

Mr. FERRIS rose.

Mr. BOOHER. Oh, the present Navy Department had nothing to do with it, I am very glad to say; neither did the officers who made the test.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think the gentleman ought to make that statement

Mr. BOOHER. Now, I am going to read a letter and show you how the coal was obtained to make this test, and you can judge whether you believe it was a fair test. I tried to get my friend from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] to say that coal did not deteriorate by lying on top of the ground and that surface coal was not so good as that taken from the mine, but, of course, he would not admit such to be the fact. I want you to hear this letter read, and you will want to know where my friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], got the information that the coal was taken out of a tunnel 100 feet deep. Here is the letter :

TERRITORY OF ALASKA, GOVERNOR'S OFFICE, Juneau, January 17, 1914.

Governor's Office,

Juneau, January 17, 1914.

Hon. James Wickersham,

Delegate from Alaska, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Judge: I note by the newspaper dispatches that the opposition in Congress to the Alaska railroad bill are endeavoring to make capital out of a statement alleged to have been made by Rear Admiral Griffin, of the United States Navy, to the effect that the tests made of Bering River coal had not been satisfactory.

No one who lives in Alaska, having a definite knowledge of the way in which the coal was mined and the quality obtained, expected that the test would be otherwise than unsatisfactory. To dig out of an open cut and transport to tidewater 800 tons or less of this coal cost the Government, I am informed, approximately $100,000. The expedition in charge of the work was a rank fallure in nearly every particular, according to the information at my command. There was a constant friction between the Bureau of Mines representatives and the Navy officials, who jointly made up the expedition, or who were in charge of it, and the mismanagement and inefficiency were everywhere apparent. In February of last year Thomas G. White, an old resident of Katalla, who assisted the Government party in getting out the coal, wrote me in effect as follows:

"If we ever succeed in getting out this coal, and it is given a test, it will be pronounced no good, and that will not be a lie either. It is no good for the reason that the coal-mining party, instead of taking coal from the tunnel on the Cunningham claim, where a veln has been developed, took it from an open cut. It is surface coal, and full of rocks and dirt and shale and other debris. No attempt has been made to secure a good quality of coal. Wait for the howl that will come up against it when the test has been made."

White was in Juneau a few days ago, and he repeated the statements made nearly a year before as to the quality of the coal mined by the expedition, adding that he could take a bunch of Indians and get 1,000 tons of first-class coal in the B injury.

Sincerely, yours,

J. F. A. STRONG, Governor.

Now, you have heard the howl, and it seems that an old settler, a laborer, who was helping get the coal out, judged it exactly and told the country what would be the result of that test. As you will see, this letter is signed by the governor of the Territory of Alaska, and ought to be good authority. [Applause.]
Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. BOOHER. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman think that even the governor's testimony ought to be superior to the Secretary of the Navy in a question of this sort?

Mr. BOOHER. If the Secretary of the Navy had known these facts, I have no doubt that he would have understood the test that was made and would not have said what he did.

Mr. FERRIS. Has the gentleman from Missouri called the attention of the Secretary of the Navy to these facts?

Mr. BOOHER. No.

Mr. BOOHER. No.
Mr. FERRIS. Why not?
Mr. BOOHER. Now, I am going to read you a letter from the Secretary of the Navy which will throw light on the subject and which I invite my friend from Oklahoma to read carefully:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 31, 1914.

Hon. WM. C. Houston, M. C., House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My DEAR Mr. HOUSTON: In reference to my previous letter to you in regard to the tests of Bering River coal, I desire to invite particular attention to the fact that these tests only relate to the coal actually tested.

As stated in that letter, there is nothing to show in the tests just completed what may be expected of coal taken from greater depths on completed what may be expected of coal taken from greater depths on other veins.

The coal as mined was apparently mixed with foreign matter to a considerable extent, either due to the presence of "bone" in the veins or to the conditions due to mining and transporting the sample tested.

The analysis of the coal showed it to have very excellent characteristics, but its ultimate behavior in the furnace could only be told by actual test. This test showed that in spite of the analysis the sample tested for some reason not yet clear did not give a high efficiency. The presence of clinker usually denotes foreign substances, but this is a matter upon which but little is known, and it might well be that coal from deeper shafts, or even from neighboring veins, would behave very differently.

The absence of smoke is a favorable feature of this coal, and the department hopes that future experience may yet show that Alaskan coal is suitable for naval use.

Sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS, Secretary of the Navy.

Now, the Bremmerton test was made from coal taken from the Copper River coal fields, about 2 miles from the place this coal was taken, and, as I have said, it tested better than any eastern coal for the Navy. I say that such a wide variance between these two tests indicates that something is wrong somewhere in the testing of this coal, because they would not vary that much if there was not. [Applause.]

In order to furnish the best evidence in support of the proposition that there was a close combination between the Pocahontas Coal Co. and the Navy Department I insert a colloquy that took place in the House in the third session of the Sixtyfirst Congress, when the naval appropriation bill was under discussion. By the way, let us not forget that the Pocahontas Coal Co. has very extensive dealings with the Government in supplying coal for the Navy.

The colloquy referred to is as follows:

Mr. Pearre. Then I understand that the gentleman's charge is that ere is collusion between the Navy Department and the eastern coal

Mr. Pearer. Then I understand that the gentleman's charge is that there is collusion between the Navy Department and the eastern coal operators.

Mr. Humphrey of Washington. I do not say who is responsible, but I am just glying the facts. I say there is no excuse for the action of the Navy in spending from $900,000 to $1,000,000 a year in bringing coal around from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific coast for the use of the Navy in time of peace. I assert that it is worse than a waste of public funds, for, in addition to wasting it, it does incalculable harm to American shipping.

Mr. Kitchin. The gentleman means to imply that in time of war they would have use for western coal?

Mr. Humphrey of Washington. Yes; in case of war on the Pacific. So if this coal is to be used in war it seems to me of highest importance that they become accustomed to its use in time of peace.

Mr. Underwood. Mr. Chairman, I agree thoroughly with the proposition advanced by the geatleman from Washington. The closest corporation in this country is the combination between the Pocahôntas coal people and the Navy Department, and it has been so for 20 years. I know that during the Spanish-American War, when Alabama coals that were perfectly good for steaming purposes were offered to the Navy Department for $3.25 a ton over the ship's rail at Mobile, only a night's sail from Tampa, the Navy Department bought Pocahontas coal and shipped it by rail to Tampa at an expense of $9.60, and that proposition has been kept up ever since.

Now, what control these particular people have over the Navy Department I do not know. But I do know this, that there is no other coal field in America that can sell coal to the Navy Department. The supply of the Navy is confined to this one field only.

Further along during the debate this colloquy took place:

Mr. Stanley. Does the gentleman know whether or not the Navy Department has made any tests of the Alaskan coal?

Mr. Hobson. I am just about to bring up that point and various other points. I wish to register here a complaint that the Navy Department is not encouraging the development of appliances so that it can use other coals. When it found, for instance, that the coal in Alabama approximated to the needs of the Navy, it would have been in line of economy and the best interests of the Government to have undertaken to develop smoke-consuming devices and other devices so that the department could then use Alabama coal.

The same applies to the Pacific coast coal, not only that mined on the mainland but that in Alaska, and the Navy Department has not shown great interest in developing additional sources of supply that would prove of great, if not vital, importance in time of war, and we are put to millions of dollars of expense, perhaps, unnecessarily. I will not say unnecessarily, but perhaps.

The gentleman from Oklahoma certainly will not require further proof to satisfy him that such a combination did exist.

The gentlemen who oppose this bill have labored long and hard to convince themselves, and incidentally to convince the House, that Alaska is a cold, bleak, and desolate country; that it has no future and is not worth developing for any purpose. In answer to their argument I will read an extract from the report of one of the ablest men in the Interior Department, who made a careful, painstaking investigation and study of Alaska and its possibilities from personal observations. I refer to Hon. James W. Witten, who for many years has been connected with the Department of the Interior and whose ability and integrity are unquestioned.

In 1903 Mr. Witten was detailed by the Secretary of the Interior as a special inspector to make a general investigation into the conditions in Alaska. His report embraces agricultural conditions and prospects, native population, fish and fisheries, minerals, coal, and timber. In his report on agricultural possibilities he said:

Much of Alaska is not situated farther north than are parts of Scotland, Finland, Iceland, Norway, and Sweden, where agricultural pursuits give employment and sustenance to more than 10,000,000 people. The main portion of Alaska is situated between the parallels which bound Finland, yet 34 per cent of Finland is being used for agricultural purposes, and supports a population of more than 2,500,000 people. Large quantities of butter, cheese, and oats are exported. Much of Alaska lies in the same zone with Iceland; and while the ocean currents may make some difference in temperature, yet Iceland, with only 10,000 square miles of land suitable for cultivation and pasture, and with a population of only 76,300 in 1898, had 21,982 cattle, 44,134 horses, 735,442 sheep, and her farmers furnished in 1890 64 per cent of all her exports and maintained four agricultural colleges. The soils of Alaska are generally of an alluvial character, particularly those in the Yukon and other river valleys, and the rank growth of vegetation everywhere to be found testifies to the fact that they are very fertile.

In summing up this part of his report Mr. Witten says:

Not only do the natural conditions have a tendency to embarrass and prevent agricultural developments, but the lack of means of transportation amounts to almost prohibition.

That farming can be successfully carried on, by permission of the Delegate from Alaska, Judge Wickersham, I shall insert in the RECORD two letters that need no comment. The letters referred to follow:

Hon. James Wickersham,
Delegate to Congress, Fairbanks, Alaska.

My Dear Judge: In answer to your suggestion that I write you a letter about my farming operations I take pleasure in doing so. When you and Mr. Joslin and Mr. Birch and Mr. White were at my place last fall I had not begun to take in my crops, but since then I have done so. I had 3 acres of potatoes, and they yielded me 18 tons, and the market price was $120 a ton, for which I sold most of them. I had 1 acre of beets, on which I and a crop of 8 tons: 2 acres of carrots, which yielded me 7½ tons, with a market price of $140 per ton; 1 acre of turnips, from which 200 sacks of 80 pounds to the sack, or 8 tons, at $80 per ton. I had 2½ tons of rutsbagas upon one-fourth of an acre of ground, for which the market price was $100 per ton. I had 1 ton of red beets on one-quarter of an acre of ground, at $140 per ton. I had 15 acres of barley, which I cut and sold for hay. I had 3½ tons which I sold for $75 per ton, and still have enough left to fill my barn chock-full for my own use for the winter. I raised 2 tons of cabbage, which I put away for the winter, besides which I sold between 3½ and 4 tons during the summer at an average selling price of $140 per ton.

I raised 29 suckling pigs. I sold 5 of my hogs to the butcher for $80 each.

This fall I put in 6 acres of winter wheat, Bluestem, which I sowed the second week in August, and before the snow came in October the wheat was up 2 or 3 inches high, and I never saw a better stand of wheat anywhere. I have raised good winter wheat, barley, and oats, and all kinds of garden vegetables, and, in my judgment, as a farmer of more than 30 years' experience, the Tanana Valley is a first-class agricultural country.

My farm is near the river and is perfectly level. The soll is sandy loam and is very rich, made up of sediment and silt and sand brought down by the river in ages gone by. The Tanana Valley opposite my farm is 60 miles wide, and there Valley.

I have several neighbors immediately around the town of Fairbanks who are engaged in successful farming, and we have in the last year raised almost enough to supply the local market, and there is no question hereafter that the whole local market in the Tanana mines can be supplied from our farms and gardens.

WM. Young.

Respectfully,

FAIRBANKS, ALASKA, November 8, 1909.

Hon. James Wickersham, Delegate to Congress, Fairbanks, Alaska.

Delegate to Congress, Fairbanks, Alaska.

Dear Sir: I was born and raised in northern Germany, on the Weser, and my parents being landowners, farmers, and stock raisers, I learned the farming and stock-raising business thoroughly. At the age of 18 I left Germany for the United States, and landed at New York. From there I went to Ohio, then to Illinois, and from Illinois I went to Nebraska, in which State I farmed and raised stock for 18 years, principally in the southern part of the State. From Nebraska I went to the State of Washington, where I engaged exclusively in the stock business—buying, selling, and shipping stock.

In 1897, at the time of the rush to the Klondike, I started for Dawson with 135 steers, but did not reach Dawson until 1898. I have been shipping stock to different parts of Alaska ever since. In 1900 I shipped stock to Nome and also to other parts of Alaska, and have traveled overland with cattle from Valdez to Fairbanks for the past seven years. I have visited the Aleutian Islands and have been on almost every one of the islands of that group, and I find that Alaska is a great country for its climate, grasses, and different kinds of small grain, such as oats, barley, and all kinds of vegetables.

I contended when I first landed at Haines mission, in 1897, that Alaska would be a farming and stock-raising country, and I am more and more convinced of that fact as I travel through the different parts of the country.

and more convinced of that fact as I travel through the different parts of the country.

Owing to the big fire at Fairbanks, I have not been in and around Fairbanks for four years, and I was very much surprised when I came here last September that the country surrounding Fairbanks had been turned into a farming and gardening community.

I came here this last time with cattle and hogs, and found that they raise as fine barley as I ever saw in any of the States where I have farmed heretofore. I bought barley, oats, and hay here from Mr. William Young, which he raised on his farm just north of the town to feed my cattle, and found it to be well filled with good-matured and well-ripened grain. I saw as fine potatoes here this fall as I ever have seen anywhere in the States. Cabbage, rutabagas, turnips, and carrois can not be beat in any of the States, and I believe that sweet potatoes will be raised here in the near future. The raising of hay has proven to be a success. I also find a lot of chickens are being raised in and about Fairbanks for the local market,

Respectfully,

WM. WAECHTER.

From this showing alone we would be justified in passing this bill.

The greatest enterprise of any age was the building of the Pacific Railroad, and it had to remain inactive and slumber for years for the lack of faith of its practicability and usefulness as a means of transportation and as an inducement to the hardy pioneer to settle up public lands of the Middle West and Pacific coast. No one now doubts its success and benefits. But it was not built without Government aid. The fact is that the money and land given the company more than constructed the road; in other words, the Government built the road and has nothing to show for it. If we build this railroad in Alaska we will at least have the road to show for it.

Let us pass this bill and follow it with a bill providing for the leasing of mineral lands in Alaska and we will have done our full duty to the people of Alaska and kept faith with the people we represent.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of the pending bill I can not refrain from calling attention to the contradictory position in which we find ourselves if the contentions of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Lenboot] and others are correct.

It is the expressed opinion of those in a position to know that in a short time we shall witness the completion, at a cost of approximately $400,000,000, of a great public enterprise in the Tropics, the Panama Canal, a wonderful exhibition of the possibilities of engineering genius. In the completion of this canal we shall witness the consummation of a project for centuries the dream of men of other lands, but it remained for the American, to whom no task seems impossible, to cease dreaming and grapple in a practical way with this great work.

The proposal to construct this great commercial highway was heartily approved by the masses of the American people, and notwithstanding the fact that it has cost many millions in excess of estimates made by the engineers, no complaint has been heard, all feeling it was a great national enterprise worthy of a great people and which would inure to the benefit of all as a commercial highway and also tend to reduce the burden of naval construction by enabling us to assemble our fleet of war vessels on either of our coasts in time of danger, escaping the long voyage around the Horn.

Having these things in mind, the American people, with patriotic impulse, rejoice as the great work approaches comple-tion. In due time it devolved upon Congress to enact legislation for the government of the Canal Zone and to provide regulations for the levying and collection of tolls to be paid by owners of vessels who saw fit to use this highway, constructed by and supposed to be an enterprise in the interest of all the people.

Strange credulity, indeed, as viewed in the light of what has transpired. He who spoke with patriotic pride of this public undertaking as "our canal" must now feel that the extent of "our" interest was principally in paying for the construction of the canal. In the enactment of the law for the government of the Canal Zone Congress, by the insertion of a clause in the law, practically declared that the vast expenditure of the people's money in the construction of this canal was not made for the general benefit of all the people, but for the special use and benefit of a part of the people, and that part of the people being those engaged in the coastwise trade, an admitted mo-nopoly. This was done in the face of a solemn compact or treaty with a friendly nation and over the respectful protest of that and other nations. But so strong was the appeal of this special interest or monopoly, made in the name of patriotism, that a | can never successfully compete.

sufficient number of the Members in both branches of Congress were beguiled into voting the free use of this highway, which had cost so much money and was supposed to be for the benefit of all the people, to those engaged in the monopoly of the coastwise trade in our country.

Thus we spend the people's money in the Tropics for the special benefit of a monopoly. But you say, what has all this to do with the pending bill for the construction of railroads in Alaska? Nothing at all, except to make plain the apparently absurd and contradictory position in which Congress is placed. In the one case we have constructed a canal for the benefit of monopolists; in the other we are asked to construct a railroad to overthrow another set of monopolists.

We are told that in this far-away frozen region of our domain an organization of capitalists has so manipulated affairs that it is impossible for other men who would undertake to promote and build railroads to obtain the necessary money to do so. In other words, certain monopolists and money kings have the game blocked, and we are advised that the only way to unlock the treasure house of Alaska is for the Government to construct the necessary railroads. Strange predicament, indeed. In the Tropics we spend the people's money to aid a monopoly or trust; in the Arctic we are asked to spend it to "bust" a trust. At this point I am constrained to say, without arrogating any particular virtue to myself and having a due regard for the opinions of others, I am opposed to both of these monopolistic

I have been a consistent opponent of Government ownership and operation of the great public service corporations of our country, believing that it is the function of the Government to regulate and control such corporations, but that the ownership and operation of the same are a privilege of the citizen. I am aware that the proposed legislation marks a departure from the policy scrupulously observed from the beginning of our Government, and the reasons for abandoning that policy at this time should be clear and conclusive. To my mind no conclusive argument has thus far been presented that, from a financial standpoint alone, the Government would be justified in constructing this railroad.

First, what of the Territory itself? Alaska is an empire in territorial extent-590,000 square miles-equal to the combined area of Great Britain, Ireland, France, and Spain. Approximately one-third of this vast Territory lies north of the Arctic Circle and is bounded on the north by the Arctic Ocean. We are told that the northern portion of Alaska consists of broken, mountainous lands, interspersed with numerous lakes and rivers, with a great expanse of swamp land, and, owing to the high latitude of this section of the country, the winters are excessively severe, while the summer season is rendered unendurable from the vast clouds of insects. We are also informed that the Aleutian Islands and the Alaska Peninsula are mountainous and volcanic; also that the southeastern portion of the country, comprising many islands and a narrow strip of mainland, has a very mild climate, considering the high latitude, due to warm ocean currents, but here the rainfall is excessive. Portions of the Territory are heavily timbered and the waters abound in fish. The soil is generally poor, and the prospects of any agricultural development are meager indeed.

With the exception of small areas along the coast it is the natural home of Jack Frost. The population is sparse, consisting mainly of Eskimos and Indians. It is claimed that the country is rich in minerals. This is true, no doubt. Surely there must be something locked up in this great Territory, otherwise it would not be necessary to unlock the so-called treasure house. And inasmuch as nature hides securely her richest mineral treasures, often in the most inaccessible portions of her dominion, am ready to believe that in this frigid and uninviting land there may be stored beneath its frozen surface great mineral wealth, and which in large measure will never be obtained unless transportation facilities for carrying food into the country and the ore out are established, either by private or governmental agencies, and in my judgment it is only on the ground of developing the mines of the country and procuring the available timber that there is the least justification at all for railroad construction.

It is perfectly apparent to any student of commerce and industry that Alaska can never be developed into a manufacturing country: First, because the population of the country will never be large, for it is idle to argue that mankind will locate permanently in such a country so long as there is ample room in more-favored climes; second, it is too far removed from the centers of population, and, with its other disadvantages,

To think of developing agriculture in Alaska to any appreciable extent or put it upon a paying basis is folly. Especially is this true when we know that in the great State of Texas, with its 167,924,720 acres of land, only one-seventh of which at this time is said to be under cultivation, and from the further fact that all the people of the United States could be located in Texas and not be more crowded than in New England at the present time. And when we realize the further fact that in the year 1912–13 the output of cotton in Texas was 4,880,210 bales, or more than one-third of the total crop of the United States, and we are told that not more than one-tenth of the land suitable for the growing of cotton is now under cultivation in that great Commonwealth, which would indicate a possible production of more than double the amount of the present cotton crop of the world. Placing a value on cotton of from $50 to $60 a bale, and the production under reasonable conditions being one bale to the acre, which, taken into consideration with the mild and healthful climate of Texas, makes it apparent to the most casual thinker that the road to success of the real-estate dealer in farm lands in Alaska will, at least, be a cold and dreary one for perhaps a number of centuries yet to come.

I have simply cited this one illustration of the State of Texas, which without further argument ought to be convincing proof that no matter how many railroads are constructed in Alaska it will have but little effect in inducing agriculturists to migrate into that country. It seems to me that some of the glowing statements relative to agriculture contained in the report of the committee should have been left out.

It is also argued that the Government should construct railroads from the coast to the coal mines in the interior for the purpose of obtaining coal with which to supply our war vessels in the Pacific. There is some force in this argument, but undoubtedly the day is not far distant when our fleets of war vessels will be using largely, if not exclusively, oil instead of coal for fuel.

Notwithstanding the fact there is apparently no good commercial reason that can be given in justification of the governmental construction of railroads based on the theory that it will bring ultimate and lasting prosperity to the Territory, there are, to my mind, some reasons why the Government should assume this burden at this particular time.

It is quite apparent that certain individuals have endeavored to control for their particular pecuniary gain whatever there is of wealth in Alaska, and it is perfectly evident to every student of railroad construction that no man or set of men are going to invest their money in the construction of a railroad into a wilderness unless they can clearly see that by so doing they will afterwards reap their reward from the people who flock into the country to make homes for themselves, open up farms, build cities, and establish industries, the transportation of the products of which would bring returns to the men who constructed the road. Heretofore it has been the policy of our Government to aid in one way and another the promoters and builders of railroads into the wild and unsettled portions of our country. And I presume that if the same policy were pursued relative to Alaska men could be induced to undertake the task. But the policy of our Government has changed, and we are now following the idea that the natural resources of the country belong to the people and should not be given to any person or corporation for any purpose.

Therefore the matter resolves itself into this one proposition. The citizen must construct the railroads in Alaska without aid from the Government and take his chances of revenue in the future. This we are convinced no man will do; consequently, the only possible way, apparently, to get railroads into this far northern clime is for the Government to build them. And in view of the gold and minerals that have been found in Alaska, together with the coal and timber possibilities, it may be wisdom to expend this money in the hope that this vast territory may prove to be of greater value than we are at present willing to concede. At any rate, the transportation of merchandise into the country and the products of the country out, during the time the ore is being excavated from the mines and the timber cut from the mountain sides and valleys, may, in a large measure, recoup the Government for its trouble and expenditure. But I am inclined to think that, after the ore is extracted and the timber cut and marketed, Alaska will continue to be, in a large measure, a barren waste and will relapse into a condition of unbroken solitude, the natural condition of all countries not agricultural in their nature.

Again, there has for a number of years been considerable agitation over the railroads of our country and the best way of regulating and controlling them, and it has been argued by some that Government ownership is the only true solution of the problem. It is true we have made some progress. We now l have the Interstate Commerce Commission vested with great power in the matter of the regulation of rates, and this commission will be soon, no doubt, clothed with power to regulate the issue of stocks and bonds by railroad companies, which undoubtedly, if judiciously exercised, would be a very wise grant of authority and one which appeals to my judgment, and when the time comes for us to pass upon that question it seems to me that the Government ought to enact such legislation as will protect interstate railroad companies from sandbagging legislation by State legislatures. In short, national governmental control, and not National and State control; a definite, clearly defined policy guaranteeing justice and protection to the owners of railroad stocks and bonds and the public alike.

Thus can the fallacy of Government ownership of all the railroads of our country be forestalled, for such a policy in a country like ours under existing political conditions would, in my humble judgment, result in national calamity. But inasmuch as the germ of Government ownership seems to have infected quite a large number of our people, I am not so sure but that a practical demonstration at this time will be the part of wisdom, and we will all await with much interest the outcome of this test about to be made in Alaska, and let us hope that the lesson we shall learn will be well worth the price.

In consideration of the foregoing reasons and with no little sympathy for the hardy pioneers who have the courage to dare the storms and chilling blasts of far-away Alaska, and in the hope this bill may result in aid and comfort for them I lay aside for the time my well-grounded conviction on legislation of this character. I shall support the measure. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, Alaska has been in controversy ever since the proposition for her purchase from Russia was presented to Congress in 1867. The Territory was then referred to as "Seward's Folly" and "Seward's Polar-Bear Garden." Many of the arguments we have listened to on this floor against this legislation are similar in character to the arguments that were uttered against the purchase of Alaska: but there were some far-sighted statesmen in those days, and among them was Charles Sumner, who made a notable speech in the Senate upon the subject of the purchase of Alaska. I may say that Mr. Sumner undoubtedly obtained his data from the then Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, who was being severely criticized because he foresaw the advantages that would result to our Government by the purchase of that great extent of valuable territory for the relatively paltry sum of $7,200,000. Mr. Sumner, in summarizing his argument, said:

marizing his argument, said:

Mr. President, I now conclude this examination. From a review of the origin of the treaty and the general consideration with regard to it we have passed to an examination of these possessions under different heads, in order to arrive at a knowledge of their character and value. And here we have noticed the existing government, which was found to be nothing but a fur company, whose only object is trade; then the population, where a very few Russians and Creoles are a scanty fringe to the aboriginal races; then the climate, a ruling influence, with its thermal current of ocean and its eccentric isothermal line, by which the rigors of the coast are tempered to a mildness unknown in the same latitude on the Atlantic side; then the vegetable products, chief among which are forests of pine and fir, waiting for the ax; then the mineral products, among which are coal and copper, if not iron, silver, lead, and gold, besides the two great products of New England, "granite and ice"; then the furs, including precious skins of the black fox and sea ofter, which originally tempted the settlement, and remain to this day the exclusive object of pursuit; and, lastly, the fisheries, which, in waters superabundant with animal life beyond any of the globe, seem to promise a new commerce. All these I have presented plainly and impartially, exhibiting my authorities as I proceeded. I have done little more than hold the scales. If these incline on either side, it is because reason or testimony on that side is the weightler.

It was said that that speech by Mr. Sumner, which occupied

It was said that that speech by Mr. Sumner, which occupied some hours in its delivery, turned the scales in favor of the purchase of Alaska. Since its acquisition our citizens have taken out over $400,000,000 worth of gold, furs, fish, and copper. And we have only scratched the surface. We have had no transportation facilities to the interior of Alaska worthy of the We have had no Thus far all that has been done has been done near the The interior of Alaska is practically a virgin field. The construction of railroads is absolutely necessary for its development. Personally I am opposed to ownership by the Government of the railroads, the telephone and telegraph systems, and, as has been recently suggested, the coal mines of our country. I believe that if we ever embark upon the system of Government ownership of public utilities the Prætorian Guard that used to sell the emperorship in the declining days of Rome would look like "thirty cents" as compared with the great army of Government employees in these United States, which could control the elections for President, Vice President, Members of the Senate and the House, and governors and legislators in the various States. They would undoubtedly be the balance of power in such great States as New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Massachusetts, New Jersey, and Missouri, and could absolutely control State and Federal legislation. But our policy of conservation as applied to the natural resources of Alaska leaves us no other alternative than to have the Federal Government build the railroads in that vast Territory. Wisely or unwisely, we have bottled up the natural resources of that great area. It is remarkable how our so-called conservation policy has been expanded beyond its true purpose. No man wants to see willful waste of any of the great natural resources of our country; but bottling them up entirely, so that present generations can obtain no benefit from the timber, the coal, minerals, and resources of that character, seems to me to be absolute folly. By a parity of reasoning the men who would have entertained ultraconservationist views of that kind a century ago might have exclaimed with just as good grace, "We must not kill any more sperm whales, because if we do our children's children will have no oil for illuminating purposes."

Mr. Chairman, the ultraconservationist discounts the inventive genius of the American citizen. Such a plea for the conservation of sperm oil for illuminating purposes would not have taken into consideration the discovery of illuminating kerosene, of illuminating gas, of incandescent and of arc lights. And it is even so with coal. In some thousands of years from now, when the coal supply of the world shall have been greatly diminished, we will be compelled to develop our heat and our power from other sources entirely. It has been well said that necessity is the mother of invention, and whenever we begin to run short on our supply of coal or timber there will be some Yankee inventor who will discover some device that will most adequately supply their places. If coal and timber are a blessing to mankind, we should use them as we require them, and not tremble about what will happen in 4,000 years from now. It would have been the part of wisdom to uncork the bottle containing all the natural resources of Alaska, so that private capital and private enterprise, under proper Government supervision, might have developed them. But having failed to do that, in my judgment it becomes the duty of the Government to undertake their development. That is the logical result of our conservation policy in Alaska.

Some of the gentlemen who have spoken on this bill have said that to bring out the gold that will be mined in the interior of Alaska will not require even a single box car. That is probably true; but the gentlemen who expressed those views have no conception of life in a mining region. The moment gold is discovered anywhere there is a rush of population to the new fields. Cities spring up over night and thousands of adventurous people enter the new area. All kinds of supplies must be carried to the camps. See what happened at the time of the Yukon excitement. Thousands of hardy pioneers went into the new mining region. A railroad was rapidly constructed over the White Pass for the purpose of accommodating them and bringing their supplies from the seaboard. Cities and towns sprang up like mushrooms. The White Pass Railroad was on a paying basis from the very beginning. And when the road provided for in this bill shall have been constructed new cities and towns will be laid out along the line, just as new cities and towns were laid out on the Canadian Pacific line in Canada, where the prospect for development seemed just as remote as for the development of the interior of Alaska.

The transcontinental railroads that were constructed in the sixties and even at a later period in our own country went through a barren country—a country that then had no cities, a country that then had no towns. But the coming of the railroads developed the cities and the towns. True, the transcontinental railroads were constructed and operated by private corporations. However, these private corporations received large Government subsidies in the nature of land grants, and large sums of money were advanced for every mile of road constructed. The scandals that arose as a result of that legislation stirred the Nation to its very center. Small wonder that we do not want to embark upon a similar sea of trouble at this time. To-day, taking a retrospective glance at the legislation for the construction of the transcontinental railroads, I feel satisfied we all believe it would have been a much wiser course to have had the Government build the lines itself and then have leased them to such railroad corporations as would have been willing to pay for the privilege of using the tracks and the necessary depots, roundhouses, freight sheds, water tanks, and similar appurtenances.

That, in effect, is what the pending bill proposes shall be done. Under its terms the President is authorized to lease the road, together with the telegraph and telephone lines necessary for its operation, to responsible corporations upon such terms as he may deem acceptable under the provisions of the bill. And if the legislation can be carried out along those lines, the engineers and firemen, the conductors and brakemen, the switchmen and track laborers, the telegraph and telephone operators, and all the other employees that may be required to run the trains will not be Government employees, but employees of the private corporation that secures the lease, even though the physical property of the road which the Government may construct is owned by the Government itself.

Mr. Chairman, I saw a statement in one of our newspapers a year or two ago to the effect that the residents of Alaska were compelled to pay $26 a ton for coal which was brought to them in ships from the world's coal fields, while at their very doors there were great deposits of coal which they dared not touch on account of our Government's attitude in having bottled up the coal supply of that Territory. To my mind such a condition is disgraceful to our country and its legislators. With the construction of this railroad all the resources of that mighty empire in the north will be developed, not alone for the benefit of the people of Alaska, but for the benefit of all mankind.

Mr. KENT. I believe that this proposition of the development of Alaska by the Government construction and operation of a railroad is a piece of ordinary common business sense. The Territory of Alaska represents the greatest real estate specula-tion that this country has indulged in. The purchase was criticized as being unwise, but it has eminently justified the wisdom of those who made the purchase. In ordinary business, if an individual owns land, the question always comes up as to what he should do with it. Is the land worth developing, or is it not? This is the crux of the Alaskan situation. The testimony, to my mind, is conclusive to the effect that Alaska is worth develop-There is no doubt but that the mineral resources are worthy of the attention of the country; that the fisheries are marvelous; that the timber resources are valuable; and that in that vast Territory there is an amount of agricultural land equal to the land that supports the highest civilization of northern Europe. What are we going to do about it? In the development of our western country, knowing little about economics or the theory of risk, believing in the sufficiency of individual initiative and that everything would take care of itself if let alone, that we should grant subsidy to private enter-prise, we gave away an immense amount of the public domain for the purpose of furnishing railroad transportation. The western railroads at first did not seem very profitable. The old question of the unearned increment of the land took time to work out, but the railroad grants, the grants of land along the lines and of lieu lands, when the land could not be obtained along the lines, have furnished the greatest abuse of land tenure in the United States.

We have given away a vast amount of our public domain to private interests for developing transportation systems which we could have better developed as a people. There is always the old question of the community and the individual. The community is everlasting. It does not perish with the generation. The community can assume risks that the individual can not assume. Are we statesmen or are we simply gauging all our questions by the individual human life here and now? Are we looking to the future or do we merely consider the present and what a man is justified in undertaking in his own short life?

I can no better state this question of the community versus the individual than by considering the very simple question of private ownership of timber. In the case of individual ownership the individual finds his interest in reaping his crop as soon as possible, regardless of the welfare of the community. He must make his dividend out of that land in his own short life and must waste or destroy in order to secure that dividend. Exactly the same question comes up in this matter of transportation and development in Alaska. If I, as an individual, who could lend all the money I could secure at 5 per cent without risk and without taxation, which it is possible to do under present conditions, were asked whether or not I would go into the business of putting a railroad into Alaska, I should surely refuse unless I could control the resources of Alaska, unless in the event of the risk being determined in my favor I could obtain 30 or 40 per cent on the investment.

Every step we take in the development of society is taken toward the elimination of this element of risk, is taken toward placing that burden upon society which the individual can not afford to bear. This is the meaning of life insurance and fire insurance, and of every other step we are taking in social advancement. The idea of corporate organization is primarily a device for dispensing with the risk of the individual life, is a plain effort to establish a narrow form of communism wherein the single life and its inevitable extinction shall not be the foundation of an enterprise. To revert to this specific case, we have first of all the question, Is this great region worth developing? The testimony is overwhelmingly universal that it is. Next, we have the question, Shall it be done by private enter-prise or by the public? There is no question about what the answer should be. If we think we can hold out from developing this vast territory we are badly mistaken. In a crowded world we have no right to cold-storage a continent. If we refuse as a people to do what business sense demands; if we say to private individuals, "Go ahead and develop it at your own risk," there will be a charge that the community can ill afford to pay, because what is a risk to the individual, to be highly compensated, is something that is not a serious charge upon the community and will probably produce great national profit.

As to the question of Government ownership of railroads, and as to whether that is a bad precedent, that question is simple, absolute absurdity. In the beginning, the railroad was a highway upon which the people could haul their own cars. We have had publicly owned railroads and privately owned railroads, and there is no more precedent for privately owned railroads than for publicly owned railroads. It is always a question of what is the best and the wisest thing to do in every given case. In Alaska, where we are empire building, is a case where the element of risk laid on the individual is more than he can bear unless an extortionate payment be made in terms of public concession, whereas if all of us take upon ourselves this development of our national resources we can well assume a burden that will cease to be harzardous as soon as undertaken.

I am not a bit afraid of talk of socialism. It may or may not be that I am a Socialist. I think an orthodox Socialist would quickly deny my right to the epithet. President Hadley, of Yale, defined socialism as "the belief of those persons who desire to extend the sphere of government." I believe in extending the sphere of government wherever it may be extended to subserve the general welfare. I would let the individual do as much as he can do, using all his initiative and efficiency, but whenever there comes a time when the individual can not or will not render a necessary service without exacting an extortionate price, then and there is a place where we ought to extend the sphere of government. [Applause.] Government by which we mean restraint is not only found in what is recognized as law. There is just as much restraint and therefore as much government in the exercise of private privilege as there is in the repression of the individual under the law. It becomes a question as to when and where we under the law should interfere with the interference that people by reason of capital, by reason of strength, impose upon us. where we as a community in municipality, State, or nation should collectively act for our own welfare instead of granting licenses to perform public functions,

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Tag-GART] is recognized.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, we are now confronted with the question. What is our duty toward our own property? have in Alaska 590,000 square miles, practically all of it the property of the United States. According to all the reports, it contains inexhaustible resources of coal and copper and great quantities of gold. According to the reports of the Department of Agriculture, a great share of it can be converted into homes

Now, what is our duty toward that domain? We can take either one of two courses. We can let it lie idle and remain unopened as an investment for the future or we can take steps to have its great resources developed. Nature fenced it in with mountain ranges and gave it rough and stern climate. Government of the United States, as if it could add to the restrictions that nature placed upon it, has forbidden the American citizen to lay his hands upon the resources of Alaska.

We have all agreed that those resources can not be developed without transportation. How can that transportation be pro-Who will build railroads there? We can have railroads built there, as the State of Texas has had railroads built and as the United States has had railroads built in other days, by giving to those who build the railroads a great share of the land. But if you and I were to vote for any such measure as that, it would not meet with the approval of the American people and we would be retired from Congress.

Mr. Chairman, every railroad west of the Missouri River was paid for by the people of the United States by giving their land for the building of it, and yet they do not own any one of those railroads. Of two railroads in Texas, I am told, one was given 20 square miles of State land for every mile of rail-road built and the other 16 square miles of land for every mile of railroad constructed, and yet the people of Texas do not own those railroads. We have now determined that we are going to build one railroad in Alaska and own that railroad. [Applause.]

Alaska has, as I said, 590,000 square miles of land. It is in the same latitude as the Scandinavian Peninsula. Why, the capital of Norway is near 58° north latitude. Three of the great capitals of Europe are at or near 60° north latitude. In the Kingdom of Norway alone there are only 144,000 square miles, and 392,628 of the ablest and most thrifty people in this world make a living in that country. In Sweden there are but 177,875 square miles, and five and one-half million of industrious and intelligent people make their living there, although their land is far away from the influence of the Gulf Stream and has a climate like the interior of Alaska, and there is no coal in the Scandinavian Peninsula. We have with us in these United States some of those people and their descendants who are able and willing to develop the agricultural resources of Alaska and make their homes there.

But I must hurry along, because I wish to say a word about coal in Alaska. Is it strange that gentlemen of the Pocahontas coal region are the first and most strenuous in their protest against developing the coal fields of Alaska? Along that line I wish to read what a former Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Meyer, said in a hearing before the Senate which was held in February, two years ago, before this matter was agitated. Mr. Meyer stated that we are now taking to the Pacific coast for the use of the Navy 150,000 tons of coal annually from the Atlantic coast, which costs $3 a ton in Norfolk, Va., and paying from $5 to $8 a ton to carry it around Cape Horn. He further stated that just as soon as the Panama Canal opens we shall have to take twice as much coal to the Pacific coast as we do now; and he further stated that if there should be a war and it were necessary for the fleet to operate in the Pacific Ocean 200,000 tons of coal a month would be necessary to be taken there.

But gentlemen say that the Navy Department has examined this Alaskan coal and that it is not of the quality required for steaming purposes. Why, Mr. Chairman, we fail to realize what an emergency war is. We fail to realize that war is an occasion when every advantage is grasped at once, when inferior coal will be used, if it is inferior, if we can not procure the superior. There are cases on record in the Navy Department where they actually used bacon for fuel on board our warships in the Civil War-anything to make a fire. Yet these gentlemen practically admit that we would be perfectly helpless with our 150,000 tons of coal and the necessity of bringing 200,000 tons a month more to the Pacific Ocean in case of war. We would be perfectly helpless in the face of the enemy, even if we utilized every ship that could move coal from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific Ocean, if we had to use none but the eastern coal. But let us read what the Secretary of the Navy said with reference to Alaskan coal.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield? Mr. TAGGART. Yes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. We will be perfectly helpless as against

Mr. TAGGART. Any power that would attack the United We could not operate our battleships; we could not haul coal enough to the Pacific.

Mr. SHERWOOD. What power did the gentleman mean? Mr. TAGGART. Any power that might attack us. I am not mentioning any particular power now.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How near are the Pacific powers to us? About 8,000 miles?

Mr. TAGGART. I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio that I understand-

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to continue for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. Tag-GART] asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAGGART. Now I yield to the gentleman from Ohio. Mr. SHERWOOD. Does the gentleman refer to Japan?

Mr. TAGGART. I do not wish to make any reference now to any country, but we would be helpless against any power in the Pacific Ocean that might attack us, if we were limited to eastern coal for any great length of time.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Where would they Where would they, on their part, get their coal?

Mr. TAGGART. They have it, and we are buying 80,000 tons of coal a year in Asia now to supply our ships in the Pacific, and leaving our coal fields in Alaska untouched. heims are getting out millions of dollars' worth of copper from Alaska now, and some gentlemen here will vote in favor of letting the Guggenheims go ahead and stopping everybody else.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to read what the Secretary of the Navy said with respect to Alaskan coal. He said:

said with respect to Alaskan coal. He said:

We have tested the Pacific coal—all the coal we could get—and we could not find anything that was unsatisfactory to the Navy. We had samples of this Matanuska coal, as it is called, and, so far as we could see, it was absolutely satisfactory. I understand the Matanuska coal field lies north of Prince William Sound, and from 150 to 200 miles from Seward on Resurrection Bay. It is known to contain extensive bodies of coal of the same or slightly superior quality to that of the Bering River field.

There is at present a railroad extending from Seward toward Matanuska for about 70 miles, which railroad was abandoned for lack of funds as well for various other reasons. It is believed that the extension of this road to the Matanuska mines would make possible the bringing of this coal to tidewater on Resurrection Bay, which has a magnificent and extensive harbor landlocked and free from ice.

I took this matter up with Secretary Fisher, and urged upon him the advisability of having a certain area reserved for the use of the Navy. He was fully in sympathy with the proposition, and made the recommendation in his report to the President, which was forwarded to Congress. I also know that the coal is of that special kind of coal which equals in quality and is of the same character as the Pocahontas coal, and is acceptable to the Government for naval purposes.

It was the Secretary of the Navy who made this statement

It was the Secretary of the Navy who made this statement before the Naval Committee of the House. Yet we come now with one experiment and denounce the judgment of that Secretary of the Navy because they went up and got some coal out of one mine and it did not give satisfactory results.

Mr. Chairman, any kind of statement may be made about the climate of Alaska and the statement can be true. The Territory is so vast and extends over so many degrees of latitude and is so affected by ocean currents and mountain ranges that it has every conceivable variety of climate. At the town of Fairbanks, near the parallel of 64°, an experiment station is conducted by the Department of Agriculture, and I will insert as a part of my remarks what is said in the report to the department for 1912, pages 50 and 51, about the grain crop, without mentioning the vegetables or the hay, which, of course, will grow where grain can be raised successfully:

Red Fife wheat seeded May 1 began heading July 3. It had sufficiently ripened to cut on September 10. It made a thick, even growth 4 feet tall and yielded about 55 bushels per acre.

Romanow wheat seeded May 1 began heading July 4. It ripened with Red Fife. The grain stood 4½ feet tall, very even and thick throughout the plat. This variety gave a yield of 60 bushels per acre. Wild Goose wheat seeded May 2 began heading July 4. It ripened a few days later than the above varieties, stood 5 feet tall, very even and thick throughout the plat, and indicated a yield equally as heavy as Romanow.

a few days later than the above varieties, stood 5 feet tall, very even and thick throughout the plat, and indicated a yield equally as heavy as Romanow.

The fall proved so cool and damp that these three varieties were cut and hung up in a shed to dry out and harden. The grain is well filled with plump kernels.

Sixty Day oats seeded May 2 began heading June 28. They made a thick, even growth about 3 feet tall, were ripe enough to cut August 10, and yielded about 85 bushels per acre.

Finnish oats seeded May 10 began heading July 4, and were ripe for cutting August 15. The crop was very heavy, standing 4 to 5½ feet tall. This variety yielded at the rate of about 90 bushels per acre.

Banner oats seeded May 2 began heading July 4, made a very thick growth 3½ feet tall, and were ready to cut August 15. This variety gave a yield of 100 bushels per acre.

Beardless barley (No. 19852) seeded May 3 began heading June 26. It made a heavy growth 4 feet tall, was ready to cut August 10, and when thrashed yielded 50 bushels to the acre.

Hull-less barley (No. 19851) seeded May 3 began heading June 25, made a thick, even growth 3½ feet tall, was ready to cut August 10, and yielded 42 bushels of 60 pounds each per acre.

The above grains were seeded with a No. 4 Planet Jr. drill on a south hillside which had been cropped to potatoes the two years previous. The tract is birne timberland cleared three years ago. No fertilizers were used on this tract, neither on the potatoes nor on the grain, but it probably represents the best soil and exposure.

Buckwheat seeded May 10 was injured by frost June 8. The first blossoms appeared July 5. It made a heavy growth 4½ to 5 feet tall. The weather was so cool and cloudy all fall that only about 25 per cent of the grains ripened. Some of this was stripped off by hand for seed, and the crop plowed under as a fertilizer. This was the heaviest growth of buckwheat the writer has ever seen, and other easterners who saw it were of the same opinion.

Fall rye and Kharkof winter wheat were se

The Trans-Siberian Railroad in Siberia follows a line ranging to 60° north latitude, and although the climate in the interior is perhaps colder than the climate of interior Alaska, agriculture flourishes along this railroad in Siberia, so much so that Siberian agricultural products are now found in all the great markets of the world. A study of the latitude and longitude of Alaska and its position with reference to other places is very astonishing. At latitude 60° north and 140° west, or near that point, are excellent harbors on the coast. At longitude 93° or 94° west and 60° north is approximately the location of Port Nelson, on Hudson Bay. Degrees of longitude at latitude 60° north are half the distance apart that they are at the Equator, so that it is less than 1,800 miles from the Pacific to the Atlantic tidewater at that latitude. Port Nelson is exactly the same distance from Liverpool as New York is from Liver pool, and is nearer the Pacific Ocean than Kansas City. the course of time Alaskan railroads will connect with the tidewater of Hudson Bay. Alaska will then be only 10 days from London. It is actually nearer Europe than the center of the United States.

The Panama Canal will revolutionize transportation between the Pacific and the Atlantic coasts. The canal is less than 2,000 miles from New York; it is 3,277 miles from San Francisco and 5,079 miles from Sitka. Ships going around Cape Horn from New York to San Francisco travel nearly 13,000 miles. The same ships can now reach Alaska by traveling slightly more than half that distance. The freight rates from the Atlantic seaboard to Alaska will be much less than the present freight rates from the Atlantic coast to the interior of the United States.

Who will say that the Government of the United States should not take steps to develop a region that comprises more than oneseventh of its whole territory? It does not mean that we are committed to the policy of Government ownership of railroads any more than the construction of the Panama Canal means that we are committed to the policy of Government ownership of canals. Alaska is an exception. In its present status no person or corporation without enormous wealth could do anything toward developing its resources. The man of small means is absolutely prevented from making a success at any kind of enterprise in Alaska. He would have no means of transportation. Railroads have been built there, not for the profits that might be derived from carrying freight or passengers, but simply as a means of reaching the mineral wealth of the inte-rior. Then the people were prohibited from taking and developing mineral claims, and some of the railroads necessarily failed. Notwithstanding all this, Alaska has an output of the value of $40,000,000 annually, nearly all from the coast, and has up to date produced more than $500,000,000 in wealth. When means of transportation are provided for the use of the people, who can estimate what will then be the value of the output of Alaska? Will not the additional revenue derived from the income tax easily pay the interest on the bonds for $35,000,000 that it is proposed to issue, and will not the sale of lands pay the principal? I believe that the development of Alaska by building these railroads will not ultimately cost the people of the United States a single dollar. If Alaska is allowed to remain in its present condition, it will never be of any value to anyone. belongs to the American people, and let us open it and help to develop its resources for the benefit of the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman, in the short time that is allotted to me I shall simply give some reasons why, from my standpoint, it is my duty to vote for this bill.

I was trained in the school of the strictest construction of the power that governs; but I believe that we have reached an era in the development of our country, with its enormous population, with its great evolution of business and the methods of business, with its great combinations of capital and their lawless disposition if uncontrolled, where we must face this proposition: Are we, under the Constitution under which we have grown so great, able to meet the problems of the present day? This bill proposes a radical innovation; but we can not hesitate at change only because it is change. Evolution of business was and is inevitable; and if we can not adjust the methods of government to the changing conditions as they occur and still be loval to our system of government then our system of government is a failure. We are confronted with the proposition of a great, unexplored section of country; and this bill proposes the inaguration of a system of governmental control over the development of a country of enormous extent and of claimed natural resources of great value. As to the extent of the resources, that can only be shown by actual development. possible courses are open to us in handling the problems presented by Alaska :

Shall we leave Alaska locked up?

Shall we turn Alaska over to the Morgan-Guggenheim syndicate or some such vast combination of wealth, or shall wethe Government having withdrawn from private exploration practically the whole of that country—provide the means, under governmental auspices, for developing its resources and transporting them to market?

No one will advocate seriously that we shall leave Alaska untouched and absolutely closed to private enterprise. With 90,000,000 of people, with the vast industrial centers over-crowded, with the great tide of emigration westward still clamoring for homes and for opportunity, it is our duty to see to it that Alaska is opened up.

It is also certain that no one will advocate the turning over of Alaska to be exploited by great combinations of tyrannical, overpowering, and selfish combinations of wealth. The history of the operations of such in our own country for the last 40 years absolutely forbids any such course. Nor can we allow such combinations of wealth to own the means of transportation to and from that vast country. The evidence so far, as abundantly brought forth in this debate, of the operations of the Morgan-Guggenheim syndicate, and especially of the absolute, almost criminal outrages perpetrated upon the people of that country, shows what the future would hold in store for anything like private enterprise while the transportation system was privately controlled.

But some fear that to pass this bill is but the entering wedge to governmental ownership of all the railroads of the country. That does not follow by any means. What is proposed is partly from the necessity of the case, and it may be looked at as partly an experiment in Government ownership and operation of railroads; but under the most adverse circumstances the ownership and operation of a railroad in a remote country like that, remote from all other avenues of transportation, in a cold, hard climate, with a meager population, certainly is putting the proposition to a most severe test, and, moreover, it will be an experiment under conditions that do not at all exist in the rest of our great country. The building of this railroad is but the beginning of a general system of dealing with Alaska and its enormous resources. The great body of the coal is still in the ownership of the Government; the oil, most of the mineral lands, and, in fact, practically all of the peninsula is still owned by the Government and at present withdrawn from any private exploitation. The situation awaits this first step in the necessity to day of reclaiming Alaska for the uses of civilization. It will have to be followed, of course, by provisions—under some system of leasing, in all probability—providing and carefully guarding the equality of opportunity for every enterprising citizen who goes there to reap the full rewards of his time, money, and enterprise by insuring at the least possible cost consistent with good service uniform and equitable freight rates for what must go into the country from the outside as well as for the transportation of the products of the country from within to the markets of the world.

Is this bill forbidden by considerations of the Constitution and the limitation of government under it? We can not take that stand, no matter if Jefferson did say, "The country that is governed least is governed best." We can not say that our reverence for the Constitution forbids us to live in the present day of wonderful evolution of business and business methods. It is a species of disloyalty to the Constitution of our great country to say that under it we can not meet the present conditions resulting from the wonderful creation of wealth that has already taken place under it. There must be evolution in Government methods under our Constitution that will be equal Our forefathers to the business methods of modern times. themselves contemplated the perpetuity of their work by provid-ing a method of amending the Constitution so as to make it consistent with the individual freedom of initiative tended to be promoted by it, to govern whatever civilization might result under the free institution of a great people.

We are to-day legislating for practically 100,000,000 people, and I for one will not consent that we are in a strait-jacket unable under our free institutions to cope with any question that may arise to preserve the initiative, opportunity, and free dom in every citizen to pursue his life, preserve his liberty, and enjoy happiness as his own will indicates. We have the power under the Constitution to control these great combinations of wealth. We are encouraged by the success of our present Democratic administration so far. It is engaged, in advocating this bill, as well as in advocating the bills already passed and those contemplated for the immediate future, in demonstrating again to the world that this is a Government truly devoted to promoting the happiness of the great mass of common people and protecting them from the rapacity of others under this form of government, whether from the individual tyrant or from the corporate tyrant. For that purpose we Democrats have at the head a President who suggests Jefferson himself in his wonderful grasp of the fundamental principles of a free government, who suggests Old Hickory in his firmness and indomitable will, and who is a worthy successor of Lincoln in his broad humanity and sympathy with the individual, however humble. For these reasons I think it is the duty of this Democratic House to pass this bill.

[Mr. LINDBERGH addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, at first I was disposed to favor this proposition. Like many able and conscientious Members of the House, it looked to me as though this was the only remedy to solve the perplexing and vexatious problem in Alaska that has affected the Nation for the past eight years. I am not prepared to discuss this question now as I would like to be. I have listened attentively to all the debates, pro and con, on the proposition; have read all the hearings before the Committee on the Territories; and have arrived at the conclusion that I can not conscientiously support the measure, although I would appreciate it if I could bring my mind to the conclusion that it would be my duty to support it. In a sense, I regret that I am unable to meet the views of my great leaders who stand sponsor for the bill, but when questions of fundamental policy confront me. I must solve them by the best light that is given me to solve them.

My party platform has been injected into this debate, and the inference left that we were directed by it to support this measure, but I am unable to read it into the platform, because no such language can be found there. If it had been in the plat-form, I would have done one of two things—either informed my people who voted for me last fall in my district before they cast their ballots that I would not support the measure or I would stand on the platform and support it.

To my mind the question involved here is fundamental, a step in the direction of driving at the very foundation of this Republic, as I view it. It involves the question of Government ownership of railroads. You can not twist and distort the English language to mean other than straight Government ownership of railroads in Alaska. Instance after instance has been cited in support of this bill that the Government in the past has in some way aided in building railroads. The report of the committee favoring this bill says we have given approximately 155,000,000 acres of land for the building of railroads in the West and Southwest. I am not here to criticize the able men in Congress who voted to give these empires of land to aid in the construction of railroads. No doubt they acted conscientiously and for what they thought to be for the very best interest of the country. That it is now universally condemned by all I think is conceded, yet the giving of land to aid in the construc-That it is now universally condemned by all I tion of railroads and the proposition for the Government to build, own, and operate them is quite a different proposition. While it is true that empires of real estate were given away to aid in the construction of railroads, yet no proposition was advanced at the time, much less enacted into law, giving to the Government the right to own, run, and operate the railroads after completion.

This bill, shortly to come before the House, not only proposes Government ownership of railroads, but gives to the President of the United States the power to operate it. The Philippine railroad has been cited as an illustration and as a reason why this bill should become a law, because our Government gave its moral support to the Philippine Legislature to issue $30,-000,000 worth of bonds for the building of railroads in these The Panama Railway has been cited as another illustration why this bill should become a law. Three reasons assigned in support of the pending measure. Whether any one of these are sound in logic and in economics I will not stop to This measure is but another milestone in the direction of the ultimate ownership of railroads in this country. In my judgment, in less than 10 years Members serving in this House will be met with the argument that as the Government built the railroads in Alaska why not the Government own and operate the railroads in this country? He who stands for the proposition of the Government spending $40,000,000 to-day to build not more than 1,000 miles of railroad in Alaska let him not stagger or pause when presented with the question of issuing from fifteen to twenty billion dollars' worth of bonds in order to buy, own, and operate the railroads of the Nation. Tremendous and mighty forces are at work in the country to-day, ever moving forward with cunning and ingenious argument toward favoring Government ownership of railroads. remains to be seen whether there will be enough conservatism left in America to meet the mad onrush of Government ownership of railroads. Believing that this is a step in the direction of ultimate ownership of railroads in this country, I refuse to commit myself to such a policy. [Applause.] I do it because I am unalterably opposed to it. Under no conditions whatever could I bring my mind to the point of supporting Government ownership of railroads in this Nation. Rather than do it I would gladly sacrifice my seat in this House and return to my constituency and to private life. It would fasten a debt upon us as long as our Nation endures. The time would never come when our offspring would be free of this mighty and gigantic debt, a debt on which tribute would be paid to the end of eternity by the toiling masses of the Nation.

The Senate bill carries $40,000,000 for the building of railroads in Alaska and proposes to issue bonds to this amount bearing 3 per cent interest, thereby entailing an interest debt upon us of $1,200,000 per year, and to this must be added the annual cost and upkeep of the road, which will amount to not less than 10 per cent per year of the original cost of construction, making a sum of $4,000,000 for this purpose-a total of not less than $5,200,000 annually as the interest charge upon the American people as a result of the building of these roads. I can not justify my conscience and my convictions upon the subject by voting a mortgage upon every infant born to-day as long as it lives, if that be "three score and ten," or, if "by reason of strength it reach four score," yet the child born to-day will not live long enough to see this debt of $40,000,000 paid, and everyone knows that this is but the beginning—a mere speck-a drop in the bucket as it were; once the system of building railroads is started upon, the Lord only knows where it will end. I refrain from prophecy.

The proof before the Territories Committee shows that to develop Alaska as it should be developed by the construction of railroads it will require the building of 10,000 miles of railroad, and the estimated cost of the construction of railroad in that country is not less than $48,000 per mile, and if it be developed as the people of Alaska and Seattle desire it developed it will entail the expenditure of $480,000,000 before at is finally completed. This stupendous sum is appalling and staggering to the human mind; is inconceivable by the mathematician much less to the layman who by the sweat of his brow must earn the money ultimately to pay this enormous bill. Ah, but we are told that Canada is building railroads. Suppose it is; is that a valid reason and justification for us to embark upon the same enterprise? Must we tax our people in order to keep abreast of what some other nation is doing? And the friends of the measure go further, and point to the fact that every Government in Europe owns its own railroads except England; using this as an argument and a justification for us to build, maintain, and operate railroads in Alaska. There is no comparison between the great Republic of the United States and every nation in Europe; those are monarchial governments, where the voice of the people is but lightly Leard in legislative bodies. Ours is a republican form of government, where the voice of the people is supposed to be supreme in legislative bodies.

Time and time again during my short career in Congress I have heard the argument used on this and on that proposition, "They are doing it this way in Europe; why not do it the same way in our country?" So far as I am concerned, I care not if every Government in the world owned and operated its own railroads; I am opposed to our Government owning and operating railroads in this country. I am opposed to it because it is contrary to our policies, our institutions, and our form of I am opposed to it because it is socialism of the rankest, wildest, maddest sort. I am opposed to it for economical reasons. I am opposed to it because when that time comes we will have the strongest centralized power upon the globe; all power reserved to the States under the Constitution will be brushed aside and set at naught. I agree that Alaska should be developed-that the door should be unlocked; and I agree further that the key with which to unlock it is railroads, but I can not agree that the people of this country should be bonded to the sum of $40,000,000 for the purpose of buying the key to unlock the storehouses of Alaska. The thing to do is to pass some wise and same legislation and let private capital go in and develop it. You can build a railroad on every square mile in Alaska at the people's expense and if you do not have the commodities to ship over it it will never pay operating expenses, much less interest upon bonds and the cost and upkeep of the road.

With all due deference to the able gentleman who portrayed such beautiful and glowing pictures about Alaska being a great agricultural country, I can not believe it; I can not agree with him on this subject. God Alm!ghty in his inscrutable wisdom never intended Alaska to be a great agricultural country; for His own reasons He set the bounds of agriculture by proper latitudes, and man, with all his cunning, science, and genius, down to this day has never overcome it and I prophesy never will. That it could be made to grow a few of the hardy vege-tables I have no doubt; but how are you going to induce men and women to settle any country where the earth is frozen countiess thousands of feet deep and where the indisputable evidence shows it costs from $125 to $200 per acre to clear it, and then compelled to let it remain exposed to the sun two or three years before it will grow anything?

People seek homes for purposes of remuneration, for the purpose of living upon them, for the purpose of raising families and educating them. With countless hundreds and millions of go to that frozen country for the purpose of making their homes and settling it? History is against it. Judging the future by the past, for a thousand years to come it will not be an agricultural country. So the only thing left to ship over the roads when completed are minerals in Alaska. I concede these are abundant; probably nothing like it to-day in the bosom of the earth in the way of coal, copper, gold, and so forth; yet when you have taxed the people, imposed this tremendous burden upon them, and built your railroads you have still got to wrestle with the problem of opening up these mines. Will the pro-ponents of this bill advocate the Government going in and operating the coal, copper, and gold mines in Alaska? Surely not. So we will be confronted with the proposition of disposing of the lands containing these valuable ores; and after the roads are built we are no nearer a solution of the question than we are to-day. The wise, sane, and sensible thing to do is to pass a leasing law and lease out the mineral resources of that Territory. Let the private capital go in, lease, and work them. By this means the Government at all times would have its hands upon the resources and would prevent monopoly, combinations, and trusts, and in this way would hold down prices to the con-sumers of these commodities. The railroads built by private capital would be under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which would have the same power to fix rates there as it has to fix the rates over railroads in continental United States.

In my judgment, the thing to do is for Congress to pass these leasing laws, let private capital go in and build the railroads, and then let them be amenable to the Interstate Commerce Commission the same as other railroads are in the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I may be wrong, I may not be following out the will and wishes of my people, may be doing my country an injustice and a wrong, but, viewing it as I do, I can not act otherwise than to oppose this measure. I think it is unwise, ill founded; a step in the wrong direction; another and powerful argument to be used in less than another decade, when we meet, as we will meet, the supreme question of Government ownership of railroads in this country; and viewing it as I do. I can not give it my support, and intend to vote against it. [Applause.

Mr. STEENERSON, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, because I believe it is our duty to develop Alaska. [Applause.] I believe that in the end the happiness and the prosperity and the strength of the people of the United States and the Nation will be promoted by this Government enterprise. [Applause.]

The argument brought against this bill by nearly every speaker is based upon the assertion that this means that Government ownership of railroads throughout the United States would be socialistic and destructive to free institutions. That is at least the implication we can fairly draw from what has been said in opposition.

Now, in the first place, the answer to that is that the conditions in the case of Alaska are entirely different from conditions here; that unless Government enterprise takes hold of the matter then the great empire of Alaska will remain undeveloped for an indefinite time in the future and there will be no opportunity whatever for individual enterprise to exert itself there.

What was the purpose of this Government acquiring Alaska? What was the purpose of the Government acquiring any territory? Those who have argued that Alaska was a great coal bin, woodpile, gold or copper mine, and that it belonged to the people of the United States to enrich them are far afield from the true reason for developing Alaska. When the United States acquires dominion over any extensive tracts of territory, the duty devolves upon it not so much to exploit the natural resources for the benefit of the people of the States as to build there a civilization, to induce immigration and settlement of the people to that territory, in order that homes may spring up [applause] and that that territory may contribute to the general strength and happiness of the whole Union. Let us take this argument of Government ownership of railroads that is advanced here. What does it amount to? Has anybody yet proven that the ownership and operation of railroads by Government is in all cases wrong or a destruction of free institutions? I submit not. The gentleman who is at the head of the State Department to-day, some years ago after traveling in Europe and seeing State-operated railroads, made the remark that if Government regulation of railroads in the United States proved a failure, the only alternative was Government ownership and operation. Manifestly that is true.

I do not believe in Government ownership and operation of railronds, but that the Government should regulate them in order that they may serve all the people equitably, fairly, and acres of unoccupied land in this country, will they migrate and efficiently-if that can not be done, if it be impossible to do that, if our regulation prove a failure, then I submit that we must adopt the other alternative. The suggestion that Government ownership and operation of railroads is more adapted to monarchical or autocratic governments rather than to governments based on the rule of the people is without real foundation. Australia, for instance, is ruled by the people just as much as we are, and they have Government-operated railroads, so that it is not correct to say that Government railroads are characteristic of monarchical or autocratic governments. The monarchical governments referred to by the last speaker in the last analysis will be found to be of the constitutional or limited variety, so that the voice of the people expressed at the ballot box to a very great extent rules. It is practically concoded everywhere to-day that the people ought to and do control; that democracy is everywhere triumphant in the greatest governments of the civilized world.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, the Republic of Switzerland-

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, I do not care anything about Switzerland. It is a little bit of a spot and is always brought up as an example, and there is no comparison between Switzerland and this country. [Laughter.] My position is that this is an exception to the general rule against government entering the field of private enterprise. Here the Government owns substantially all the land with all its natural resources. We are not willing to repeat the mistakes of the old land-grant policy, and unless we do, private enterprise will not build railroads there. In constructing and operating this railroad we are not pursuing a socialistic, but an individualistic tendency.

I favor this bill because by extending this enterprise into the interior of this great domain we will make it possible for people there to build homes for themselves and to earn a living by their own exertions.

It seems to me that during this debate and discussion the real reason for this measure has not been emphasized. On page 13 of the report I find one reference to that:

Unrestricted monopoly might develop immense values there for private interests, but the development to be fostered is such as would utilize these great values for the American people and furnish homes for the rearing of noble and hardy men and women.

That is the real reason for supporting this bill. The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DAVENPORT). The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I thought I was entitled to 15 minutes, and I think I have used only 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The only thing the present occupant of the chair knows is that the former occupant of the chair called his attention to the fact that at this time the time of the gentleman would expire.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I think I am entitled to a little more time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from Minnesota having more time?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEENERSON. The question comes up in every de-bate, How far may the Government extend its sphere of activify or its functions without being charged with having a tendency toward socialism? As I have explained in this case, this proposed Government activity, instead of tending toward so-cialism, tends directly the other way. It is a strange thing, but it is true, that, although you may hear everywhere men advo-cating socialism and others advocating the let-alone policy, the theory of laissez faire, that we should be governed as little as possible, yet in all the tides of time, we have never yet had a Government that followed in practice either doctrine.

To say that the Government might not interfere with the ownership and operations of railroads, where it was necessary, where not to do so would involve the destruction of individual rights and homes, I deem to be untenable. It is only analogous to the argument that you must not interfere with nature any-Does anyone contend that it is wrong to put an iron shoe upon the hoof of a horse? That is interfering with nature, and yet to do so enables the horse to travel faster and better. And if we can so interfere in the affairs of the people, by furnishing public utilities, if you please, that thereby it becomes possible for individuals to establish homes and flourish and maintain themselves as independent, free citizens of the community, then it is the duty and it is wise for the State to undertake that activity. There is no State, and there never was, built upon the theory that you could not interfere with the industries and activities of the people, nor has anyone ever been successful in establishing a society or a state upon the other theory, that there should be common property in all means of production, and that the Government should be the only employer and the payer of wages. We fear that. We rightly fear socialism. But why?

Not because we believe that the coming of the ideal State, pictured in the writings of the Socialists, would be undesirable. but it is impossible, and while pursuing this Utopian dream we would so overload and magnify the work of the Government that we now have as to destroy the independence and liberty of the individual citizens. The tendency to increase the functions of government is world-wide, and is not due to any conscious design or plan but to changes incident to the development of our industrial life. The world has grown smaller, and the people in it are gradually becoming more and more dependent upon each other for their very existence. Stop the exchange of commodities even for a brief moment and it would cause suffering and hardship unspeakable.

While these revolutionary changes have taken place in the economic and industrial field, civilized man has not improved very much, either socially or morally, and hence the necessity for greater and greater compulsion, which is government, to force him not to overreach, cheat, or injure his neighbor. This necessity explains the need for Government regulation of public utilities and interference with monopoly in trade and business. Where regulation fails there Government ownership has been resorted to. Monopoly in private hands, left unregulated, has proved intolerable, because human greed is too strong to be restrained either by the sense of justice or regard for others, and hence we say it must be regulated by the Government, and, failing that, Government or municipal trading is the last alternative. This course, however, can not in any true sense be said to be "socialistic," because the ultimate object aimed at is not socialism but individualism. If private monopoly were allowed unrestrained sway, the individual would to that extent be economically enslaved. Generally speaking, therefore, Government trading is entered upon and justified only where on account of the tendency toward monopoly private enterprise undertaking the work can not be successfully regulated in the interest of the individual. It may also be entered upon where private enterprise is inadequate like, for instance, the Panama Canal. The proposed Government railroad in Alaska can also be justified on similar grounds, and its construction by making accessible the vast treasures of soil, mine, and forest of that imperial domain will furnish opportunities for the individual home builder which would be denied him under development dominated by private monopoly.

The Socialist denounces competition and advocates monopoly, because it will, in his view, hasten the revolution that is to overturn capitalism and substitute therefor his ideal system. The social reformer encourages competition and the regulation and restraint of monopoly in the interest of the individual and his economic freedom and development under the existing order. He believes that civilization in the future, as in the past, will be a gradual progress to greater freedom and better things economically, socially, and morally. The extreme conservative who so fears Government expansion that he will not curb monopoly by strict regulation or, failing that, by Government ownership of a public utility is really aiding the revolutionist who seeks to overturn our social system and our form of government, for unrestrained monopoly in private hands will eventually become intolerable and result in revolution. While ordinarily, therefore, it is wise to confine the Government to its primary functions, it is not only permissible but obligatory to expand them whenever necessary to curb monopoly in order that the individual may have enlarged opportunity to become economically independent and the founder of a home, for, after all, the family is the unit upon which our whole political and social structure rests. Such expansion tends to progress and not to revolution and is the logical political development of the age in which we live. [Applause.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, the largest question that has arisen during the discussion of this very important bill is that of Government ownership and operation of railroads. There is no question but that this bill is going to pass the House of Representatives. [Applause.] There is no doubt but that it will pass by a large majority. I think there is no question but that it would pass by a larger majority except for this element of opposition that has arisen through the belief that the building of a Government railroad in Alaska might lead ultimately to Government ownership of railroads in the United States.

Personally, I believe in the highest degree of personal liberty so long as the action of the individual is in consonance with justice and decency. I would gladly go out to-morrow and fight against the establishment of any monarchy where the American flag now floats. I do not believe that the people of the United States will ever consent to have any single foot of territory over which the Republic has once exercised its jurisdiction afterwards pass into the hands or under the control of a monarchy.

But I have no fear from the viewpoint of those who are opposed to this bill because it might lead to Government ownership. There is no question but that if this railroad to be constructed in Alaska proves to be a great success-and I have no doubt but that it will-if it establishes and demonstrates that freights and passengers can be carried cheaper by a Government railroad than they can be carried or are being carried by privately owned carriers, there will be a general demand for Government owned and operated railroads, and under those circumstances there ought to be such a demand.

There is no other great power in the world, as has been said, except the British Isles, but that owns and operates to-day a substantial part of its railroads. New Zealand, Australia, Germany, France, Belgium, Holland, Austria, Italy, Denmark, the great powers of Europe, and the colonies of Great Britain, are operating their own railroads, and at great benefit to those nations. We have the richest country in the world. We have the largest in point of population outside of China and India. We have the greatest natural opportunities, but we have as many poor people as any enlightened country in We have as many people under the Stars and the world. Stripes who have a hard time getting three meals a day as any country in the world that is civilized. We have one hundred and twenty billions of wealth, it is true, but 50 men through interlocking directorates, control 40 per cent, or nearly half of it. Two hundred thousand men own outright 70 per cent of the wealth of this Republic. I am in favor of the individual. I am a Republican and have been from the time I was born. My father and three of his brothers served in the Union Army. But I come down here to Washington and I vote with the Democrats or with the Progressives, or with the "what-nots," when-ever they propose a bill that I believe is right.

I believe that the building of this railroad in Alaska will be a great benefit to those people outside of this collateral question. Many settlers have gone to that Territory.

The Executive of this Republic, backed up by a conservation sentiment, has withdrawn from entry the mineral lands of that great Territory, as large as one-fifth of the United States. is impossible, practically, for a citizen to acquire a homestead in Alaska, because it is necessary for him to prove, in order to get the title to a homestead, that the lands embraced in his claim are nonmineral, which has always been a provision of the homestead law; and, besides, he is harassed by the special agents who are sent to Alaska.

It is no wonder that only 126 citizens have perfected titles to homesteads in Alaska under those conditions.

Now, a stranger dropping into this Chamber during certain stages of this discussion might have thought the sole issue involved in this bill was whether or not the coal in Alaska was fit for the Navy, and whether or not that fact alone would justify the building of this railroad by the United States. has enormous amounts of coal fit for all domestic uses, cooking and heating, there is no dispute. But the issue has been raised that it is not fit for the Navy; that it is not as efficient as Poca-hontas coal; that is, a ton of it, some say, will produce only 43 per cent as much heat as the Pocahontas coal, while others say it will produce 75 per cent as much heat.

Now, it does not matter, if you start a battleship across the Pacific Ocean, whether you have Alaska coal of the kind tested by the Navy or whether you have Pocahontas coal; that ship will go just as fast if you keep the furnace full of coal.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. Seldomridge] is recognized.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, the time allotted to me in the discussion of this important measure is entirely too short to permit of a comprehensive presentation of the subject in all of its various aspects.

I believe that this question should be considered entirely with reference to the future needs of the great Territory of Alaska, which embraces within its area a territory as large as onefifth of the United States, or about 590,000 square miles.

The report of the Director of the Census for 1910 makes the following statement concerning the production of gold in the Territory of Alaska:

The total value of the products of all mining industries in Alaska in 1909 was $16,933,427. Of this amount gold and silver mining contributed $16,327,752, or 96.4 per cent. This product came principally from the placer gold mines, the gold produced at these mines having a value of $12,762,032, which represented 55.5 per cent of all placer gold produced in the United States in 1909. The value of the gold and silver produced in deep mines was $3,565,720. The industry next in importance was the production of copper, the total value of which was reported as $464,225.

duction of the Territory has amounted to over $429,000,000, divided as follows:

Minerals:	9107 B10 F00
Silver	$195, 916, 520 1, 500, 441
Copper	8, 237, 594
Gypsum	547, 345
Marble	185, 443
Tin	88, 062
Coal	338, 189
Sea and fur products:	000, 100
Fur-seal skins	51, 835, 143
Aquatic furs, except seals	12, 496, 063
rurs of land animais	8, 350, 290
Walrus products	368, 053
Whalebone	1, 707, 410
Fishery products	147, 953, 977
Total	429, 523, 630

From an original investment of $7,500,000 made by Secretary Seward in 1867, which has resulted in a return to the Nation since that date of over $500,000,000, who is there to contend that the Nation should not enter into a more definite undertaking to develop the hidden wealth of the country?

The product of the Alaskan fisheries is practically assured for generations to come with proper Government oversight and regulation. We may also secure a continuance of fur products both from land and aquatic animals if we have proper laws to prevent waste and depredation, but we can never secure development of the hidden mineral resources of the interior without furnishing our citizens with proper means of transportation necessary for such development.

It is a striking fact that the most productive gold-mining propositions are those in which there are large bodies of low-grade ore. The Treadwell mines are treating ore at a profit which does not run over $2.50 per ton. We have made wonderful progress during the past 10 years in the discovery of treatment methods for low-grade ores, and there is abundant evidence that the interior of Alaska has an unlimited supply of ores of this character. Private capital can not and will not undertake any development of these mining areas under present condi-Transportation charges on mining machinery, together with the high cost of living made necessary by these prohibitive charges, does not justify the construction of expensive milling plants for the treatment of low-grade ores. These can only be successfully operated and constructed when the Government will take hold of the transportation problem and provide the means for putting machinery on the ground and giving the comforts and conveniences of civilization to those who will be willing to go to Alaska and become interested in her mineral development.

Each new strike during the last 16 years has made known large deposits of low-grade gravels that would not pay to work under the primitive and costly methods of the individual. In later years areas of sufficient extent have been obtained to warrant the installation of costly hydraulic and dredging machinery and the richer portions have been operated; but even with the most improved methods of handling there remain great areas that, owing to the excessive cost of labor and supplies, do not justify development. These areas of low-grade ground, which it will take years to work out, will have to await improved transportation facilities as the only means of reducing the prohibitive costs.

In the Shushana district the present quoted price of such commodities as beans, bacon, sugar, and so forth, is $1 pound, the price of one sack of flour being $50. Thus it has been during all of the stampedes, with costs greater or less, governed by the distance from rail or steamboat terminals. As soon as trails and roads are cut out and streams bridged these costs are reduced, but never have they reached the basis where it is possible to work the gravels of lower value, except in a few favored sections close to water transportation, where large hydraulic or dredging plants could be installed. The result has been the "creaming" of the richer deposits and leaving the others until the country is generally opened up and it will pay to build railroads.

The opponents of this measure lay great stress upon the fact that the income derived from the operation of a Governmentowned railroad will not justify the expenditures. I am perfectly willing to admit, Mr. Chairman, that this railroad is not to be built for the purpose of securing a profit to the Government from its direct operation, but I justify its construction on account of the fact that it will be a Government highway over which shall flow into Alaska the necessary tools and appliances to develop the interior and over which shall flow out reported as $464,225.

By reference to Senate Document S82, of the wealth produced in Alaska from 1867 to 1911, we find that the total pro-receipts or passengers hauled, but is to be estimated in the aggregate increase of the wealth produced from the Territory.

It seems strange that come of those who are opposing this measure on the ground that it is a Government project should fail to remember just what has been done by our Government in the development of the great West. In a letter addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Territories, under date of January 19 last, the Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Franklin K. Lane, has clearly stated the amount of land that this Government bestowed upon private railroad corporations in the form of railroad land grants. The Secretary writes:

of railroad land grants. The Secretary writes:

The records of the General Land Office show that land grants made by Congress in aid of private railway construction in this country averaged about 7,500 acres of land for each mile of railroad built. Railroad land grants made by Congress have aggregated 158,139,000 acres, or 247,093 square miles. These land grants equal in area a territory as large as the combined area of the New England States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia.

How much other public aid has been given to private railroad building in the form of land grants by States and subdivisions of States and principal on bond issues can not even be approximated with any degree of certainty.

Reliable authorities have stated that the actual cost of construction of the Union Pacific Railroad was approximately $50,000,000. The cost to the railroad company of this construction was $93,500,000, nearly $43,000,000 being taken in profit by the contractors and the Credit Mobiller. Land grants to the Union Pacific alone were made to the extent of 11,309,844 acres in addition to the Government's guaranty of bond issues and interest. Previous to the settlement of the Government with the Pacific roads it was estimated by the inspecting engineer of the Union Pacific system could have been reproduced for $37,280 a mile, whereas at the time the average per mile of subsidized mortgage debt and interest on the road to the credit of the Government was $47,465 a mile.

Land Office records show that land grants by Congress in aid of the construction of private wagon roads were made at the rate of 1,500 a mile.

Land Office records show that land grants by Congress in aid of the construction of private wagon roads were made at the rate of 1,900 acres of land for each mile of road, while early canal building was aided by congressional land grants averaging 63,700 acres of land for each mile of canal.

But the United States is not alone in having deeded millions of acres of land in order to aid railroad construction. Canada has followed our example, and from the letter above referred to the Secretary makes mention of the following facts in connection with railroad construction in Canada:

From 1876 to 1912 there had been built in Canada something less than 10,000 miles of railway under private ownership. In Government aid these roads had received cash subsidies aggregating $208,072,073 and land grants to the extent of 56,052,055 acres from the public domain

In other words, it has cost the Government in Canada $20,000 in cash and 5,600 acres in land for every mile of road built under private ownership in that country. Some part of these cash subsidies are in the form of loans which the railroads are under agreement to repay.

The attention of the civilized world has been directed to the great work performed by the Russian Government in constructing the Siberian Railroad, a project of daring conception and enterprise. This railroad was built entirely by the Russian Government. It is 4,272 miles long. Its construction involved the cost of $180,000,000, or at a rate of a little less than $28,000 per mile. Not only did the Russian Government expend this vast sum in the construction of the railroad, but it expended an additional amount of over $11,000,000 to encourage settlement of the country and to develop its trade. The Russian Government has constructed over 7,000 miles of railroad in Asia alone.

I have no fear whatever that the undertaking of Alaskan railroad construction by the Government will encourage the growth of socialism. Socialism is encouraged and developed more by the inactivity and helplessness of the Government to meet its responsibilities and correct public evils than it is by the operation of governmental functions. It is as clear as the noonday sun that private enterprise and private capital can not undertake this work and responsibility. There would be such a heavy tribute and charge made upon the population and production of Alaska as to greatly retard and prevent its development. Our knowledge of the wealth of Alaska, which is no longer founded upon conjecture, but has for its basis the returns of the past 25 years, calls upon us to undertake this work.

We have recently expended $375,000,000 in a great enterprise of international worth. We have no facts before us to confirm the opinion that the Panama Canal will be self-supporting as far as the tolls received are concerned. We believe that we will receive adequate returns in the great impetus given to our commerce and manufactures and that we will bring our country into closer communication with the teeming multitudes of the Orient and the countries on the west coast of South America, with whom we expect to find a large and most profitable market for our manufactured goods.

I am but little concerned about the possibilities of agricultural development in that Territory, and I do not care very much about the immediate development of the coal areas and their productive capacity. But I do believe that the develop-ment of Alaska will result in a vast increase in the world's supply of precious minerals that will be brought out from the interior of that country.

In emphasizing as I do the possibility of great mineral development of Alaska, I am not unmindful of the fact that it will create a larger market for agricultural and manufactured products on the Pacific coast. A great population in Alaska engaged in mining operations will be obliged to secure its food supply in large measure from our Pacific coast territory. While there is some reason for the claims of those who favor the bill that there are agricultural possibilities in Alaska, yet I prefer to support the measure solely on the benefit to be derived from the mineral product rather than from agricultural development. I know from experience that an active and increasing mining population gives the farmer one of the best markets possible, and if it should happen that we are to make Alaska the great gold-producing territory of the world, there is no limit to the market which may be opened there for the products of the farm and factory that can be supplied by our western terri-

A study of the mineral production of Alaska reveals the fact that gold constitutes its chief element, and of the gold production the greatest percentage is that derived from placer mining. This placer mining has been largely developed along the water courses during the summer months when it is possible for mining of that character to be carried on. It inevitably follows where there is a great supply of placer gold that this gold must come from the fissure veins in the mountain regions; and for that reason I believe that the opening of the country to settlement, and the prospecting of the mining areas will be followed by a great increase in the production of gold.

The construction of a publicly owned railroad, making the conditions of life in the interior comfortable and less expensive, providing cheap transportation rates for the introduction of mining machinery, the cutting of timber for mining purposes, and all other supplies needed for deep mining, will contribute greatly to the interest and activity that will be aroused in this feature of mining.

Alaska must be developed through American enterprise and by American interests and through American industry. It offers no field of opportunity to those who live in warm climates, where living is achieved with little energy or effort. Those who have gone there under conditions which charm and fascinate us as we read the story of their hardship and endurance certainly deserve the gratitude and the appreciation of all American citizens

And so, Mr. Chairman, I believe that as an incident to the development of that great region the construction of this railroad is a necessity. I understand it will take only a comparatively short time after this railroad has been built into the interior, connecting the great watercourses of the Yukon and the other large rivers with the seacoast, before communication will be as easy with our cities on the Pacific coast as it is now between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and people will then be able to travel from San Francisco or Seattle into the interior of Alaska with the same degree of comfort, and possibly with the same amount of cost, as they now travel from one end of this country to the other. And as we cheapen living, and as we bring the conveniences of civilization into that region, shall inevitably increase the population there. [Applause.]

I look with great eagerness to the completion of this enterprise, believing that it will greatly hasten the settlement of Alaska; that it will develop a population who will be satisfied with the conditions under which they can live; that it will bring the comforts and the conveniences of our life here in the United States to all who are willing to go to Alaska and cast in their fortunes with the development of that country.

There is great wealth to be found by the strong and adven-There is every attraction to our enterprising American turous. youth to leave the comforts of life here and plunge into the life That which contributed most to the development of our western country in the early sixties was the belief that at the end of the journey there was gold for those who were willing to embark upon the road and face the dangers that confronted them. It was the thirst for gold in the late forties that took the hardy pioneers across the continent to California, and it was that thirst for gold that made them tread through the not morasses of the Isthmus in order to reach that region, and thus brought California to the attention of the world. In my own State of Colorado it was the discoveries of gold, in connection with the finding of the precious metal in streams adjacent to Denver and Pikes Peak, that brought the pioneers across the prairies and induced them to settle that region. And just as they found gold in the sands and in the banks of the streams, so they followed those watercourses into the mountains, and by energy and perseverance brought to light the mines which have added so much to the growth and development of our country.

I assert and predict that we have not touched the hem of the garment of wealth that is in Alaska, but that we have simply extracted from the placer washings of the creeks and rivers what might be called the cream of the gold. I believe we shall only find the key to the great treasure house there when the prospectors have fought their way up the mountains and into the hills from which this placer gold has come; and in order that they may find this treasure and reveal it to the world. that they may find this treasure and reveal it to the world it is necessary that this Government shall stand behind them by contributing to their enterprise and affording to them the conveniences and tools with which to prosecute that development.

I believe that this great public work is justified and demanded. We are face to face with this condition, that unless we act in this way private capital will not undertake this work; that there can not be the investment of private capital without an adequate return for the money invested; and I therefore contend that this Government can well afford to put into this investment $35,000,000 or $50,000,000 without expecting any return of interest upon the capital invested, deriving, as it will, large and ample income from the development and growth of [Applause.] the country.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. An-The CHAIRMAN.

DERSON] is recognized.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I should not trespass upon the patience of the committee at this closing hour of this long debate were it not for the fact that since I have been a Member of the House and before I have had a peculiar and a very considerable interest in Alaska and its problems; were it not for the fact that I was perhaps the pioneer, at least one of the first, to propose the construction and operation of a railroad in Alaska by the Government as a means of at once developing and conserving the resources of that Territory.

This discussion has covered a very wide range. Some of it seems to me likely, if indeed it is not calculated, to detract from the fundamental issue involved in the proposition itself. are prone to consider the Government construction and operation of railroads in Alaska as an end in itself rather than as a means to an end. We did not purchase and operate the Panama Railroad because the Government desired to go into the railroad business. We did not establish on the Canal Zone a great mercantile enterprise, with more than a million dollars' worth of stock, doing an annual business of $6,000,000, because the Government desired to go into the mercantile business. We did not establish there an ice-making plant, a laundry, a coffeeroasting plant, and beef-corning plant because the Government desired to enter into those enterprises. We concluded to operate the Panama Railroad because the operation of that railroad was a necessary incident to the construction of the Panama We entered upon those other mercantile enterprises because they were necessary to the convenience, the health, and the well-being of the employees of the canal. We are going to build this railroad in Alaska, not because the Government desires to go into the railroad business in Alaska, but because we desire to conserve and at the same time develop the resources of that Territory [applause], because we want to develop not alone its mines but its agriculture and its factories, and give to it a civilization that will be both symmetrical and self-sustain-We want to make it not only a good place in which to make money but a good place in which to live. In short, we wish to develop its resources for the benefit of all the people. What can be more appropriate than that the master facilities of development, without which development is impossible, shall be furnished and operated by that instrumentality which is designed to promote and foster the welfare of all the people, the United States Government,

We own Alaska, own it absolutely and without condition. We are free to do with Alaska what good business judgment dictates we ought to do. We need not shut our eyes to the human experience of the past hundred years in our own country. know, and it is a matter both of public record and of judicial determination, that in the train of private ownership of railroads in this country there came monopoly of our coal, our natural gas, our oil, and our timber. Certainly we are not foolish enough to believe that we can establish and carry out the same policy in Alaska that has brought upon us these evils in our own country and escape them in Alaska. Why, only last week the Interstate Commerce Commission delivered an opinion in which it was stated that millions of dollars have been lost to the railroads, especially the industrial railroads of this country, in special services granted to industrial corporations without charge. Every railroad in Alaska to-day, with one possible exception, is an industrial railroad. We know that if private capital furnishes, develops, and operates these railroads, it will develop them and operate them with a view to private profit. Private capital is selfish. It looks to immediate returns, and immediate returns in Alaska mean the fastening upon the people of that Territory, at the time when they can least bear them, of a vast charge which will be projected into the future. There is no inherent right in private capital to make a profit out of the public utilities of a country. Public utilities, to be real, must be developed and operated with an eye single to the public welfare. moment that you begin the construction and operation of railroads in Alaska with a view to profit, just that moment the railroads of that country become, not the utilities of the public, but the instruments of profit of a few men.

Mr. WILLIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. WILLIS. I know the gentleman has given a great deal of attention to this general subject, and I want to invite his attention to the provision of the bill which authorizes, empowers, and directs the President to lease the road after it is constructed, and authorizes him to operate it only on condition that he can not lease it. What is the opinion of the gentleman as to that leasing clause?

Mr. ANDERSON. Personally, I should be very much opposed to the leasing of this railroad, for it seems to me that to do so would deprive the Territory of the very thing which we intend to give it-a maximum of service at a minimum of charge.

In other words, we propose Government construction in order that we may have the advantage of the Government's credit and its low rate of interest. We expect that this vast credit and low rate of interest will be reflected in lower costs of operation; in brief, we hope to eliminate the element of private profit and private risk from the costs of both construction and operation. We can not do this and lease the railroad.

Again, underlying the purpose of public service in construction and operation of the road and the elimination of private profit and risk, is the desire to avoid the ills which have attended private construction and operation of railroads, both in this country and in Alaska-to prevent the monopoly of its natural resources.

The history of construction and operation of railroads, more especially of industrial railroads, shows that they have been an incident in the development of private industrial enterprises for profit. It shows-and this is a matter of judicial determination-that it has been practically impossible to prevent the industrial enterprise from obtaining from the railroad special privileges, advantages, and services, as well as arrangements of freight charges, which had the effect of giving the industry a monopoly and destroying independent competition. This is the inevitable result of private operation, especially in a new country. We can avoid it only by providing for the construction and operation of the railroad by the Government, because the Government is the only instrument with a real public-service motive and that has no private motive or interest of profit to serve. The whole proposition is concerned with the question of whether railroads are to be constructed for the public use and benefit or for private use and benefit. It is the same old proposition that no man can serve two masters. The railroads of Alaska must either serve the public welfare or private profit. They can not both serve public welfare and private profit.

In this bill we are offered an opportunity for real constructive statesmanship. If we fail to take advantage of it we shall not only commit an error of judgment, but we shall be derelict in our duty to the public and to the people of Alaska; for in the last analysis the proposition resolves itself into the question whether railroads in Alaska are to exist for the industries and the people of Alaska or the industries and people of Alaska are to be exploited for the benefit of the railroads

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, in my discussion of the bill now before the committee I shall not give much time to the question of the resources of Alaska. I am thoroughly satisfied that we have in that Territory a wonderful country, rich in minerals and fisheries, and capable of great development. The question of agricultural resources which has been so largely discussed does not seem to me of great importance, further than it may have a bearing on the general question of development. It is not necessary or desirable that we should build railroads in Alaska in order to develop its agricultural possibilities. the great project, however, of opening up that great region for the devolpment of its mineral and fishery resources, the possibility of some agricultural development for the maintenance, or at least a partial maintenance, of its own population is of importance. Conflicting statements as to agricultural possibilities have been made in this debate. I have never visited Alaska, and I have no personal knowledge of the subject. I will, how-ever, present for the information of the committee testimony of one witness whom I know personally and whose testimony I know is reliable and disinterested. The following is from an address made several months ago in Lapeer, Mich., by Mrs. Lucy White Williams with reference to an extended trip through Alaska. Mrs. Williams, who is the treasurer of the National Federation of Women's Clubs, is an experienced traveler and a keen observer. In that address she said in part:

eler and a keen observer. In that address she said in part:

Agriculture in Alaska is in its infancy, but it is a healthy and promising infant. At the present day every part of Alaska which has emerged from the first state of ploneer life grows vegetables. Wherever gardens have been planted the yield has been abundant and the quality of the vegetables superior. To us it appeared only necessary to turn the soil in order to have seeds grow. Vegetation has an almost tropical rankness. We visited the Government experimental station at Sitka and found most of the fruits, vegetables, and flowers to be found on a similar farm in Michigan. Strawberries were really delicious and of immense size. Many of the flowers I am trying to cultivate in my garden are indigenous to Alaska. Some seasons the excessive cold rains and lack of sunshine prevent them from maturing. In the interior of Alaska the climatic conditions are different. Since 1902 the United States Government has had agricultural experiment stations in Alaska. They are all under the immediate supervision of Mr. Georgeson, who lives in Sitka, others have been established at Kodiak, Kenai, Copper Center, Rampart, and Fairbanks. The work in all of these stations is progressing satisfactorily. The interior is better adapted to agriculture than the coast line.

The bill before us is, in my judgment, the most important piece of legislation so far as its ultimate effect is concerned of any proposition that has come or will come before this session of Congress. I feel this because of the fact that it brings the attention of the country to a focus upon the immense railroad question-the question of what are we going to do with our railroads and what are our railroads going to do with us.

Our railroads are the great highways of commerce, the great arteries of trade. Their mileage to-day in the United States is quarter of a million miles. They influence every human activity; they connect the producer and the consumer. If they properly perform their functions, they make easy interchange of the labor of man, stimulating production, extending the market of the producer, lightening the burden of the consumer, and making possible for our humblest citizens a higher standard of living than was ever dreamed of by the ancients. Failing to perform properly their functions, they are a restraint upon commerce and industry and economic advancement. They are to civilization to-day what the watercourses and highways were to our forefathers. By reason of his appreciation of the importance of the control of the Mississippi River, Jefferson brought about the great Louisiana Purchase. To-day more than a score of great railroad bridges cross this river and more than 30,000 cars, carrying passengers and freight, go over these bridges daily, emphasizing constantly that new ways have succeeded the old and are serving fields that the old could not reach. The conditions covering the use and operation of such arteries of trade are of vital importance to our civilization.

This past century, which has been an age of railroad development, has recorded greater change and greater progress industrially and economically than has any thousand years of history before. Living in the midst of rapid change, we do not always grasp quickly enough the significance of developments of the highest importance.

The century which gave to the world steam, electricity, and gasoline, the three great forces of industry, has likewise produced legions of machines driven by these new sources of power, and each producing for the use and support of mankind and creating commerce undreamed of in other days. The same dynamic trinity which has revolutionized manufacturing methods and substituted economic cooperation of labor for wasteful individualism of effort and made cheap necessities of the expensive luxuries of our grandfathers—has made possible transportation methods essential for the extension of the cooperative idea to a world-wide scope. While in other days of homespun and hand-made articles each village was a world unto itself, to-day each village has brought to its doors the products of labor the world over, and thereby enjoys a higher standard of living. These industrial changes have brought, likewise, a corresponding economic and social change. Economists of other days were forced to accept the monstrous Malthusian theory, declaring that population tends to increase more rapidly than does the means of support, and that hence poverty—nay, starva-tion—must always be with us. To-day we have no need to be-lieve such a slander upon a merciful God—no need to believe that this world must of necessity have always within it the horrors of miserable poverty.

To-day I believe, with Edison, that poverty is no longer necessary in the world. The great problem for humanity is to equalize the opportunities of life so far as possible and to permit even the humblest of the poor to share in its wonderful ad-

In this new industrial world farm and factory and fireside, producer and consumer, centers of industry and markets every where are bound together by great throbbing arteries of trade, and foremost among these is, as I have said, the railroads. If these roads are to be conducted as great toll roads levying heavy toll on the commerce as it passes over them from producer to consumer, holding the producer down to the lowest possible price for his products and holding the consumer up to the highest possible price for that which he would buy, this heavy toll through the doctrine of "what the traffic will bear," which was the guide of private rate making under private ownership and control, then these roads are not aids but rather hindrances and obstacles to progress and civilization.

We early appreciated the possibilities and advantages of their use but not so soon the possibilities of abuse. We showered railroad promoters with bonuses, land grants, exemptions, and privileges, all that they might develop our cities and our Nation. Not realizing the danger, we gave to private ownership a free rein, and nowhere was private initiative handicapped by "fanatical" legislation. Unrestrained private ownership failed miserably. The commerce that should have been served was preyed upon, and the growth of rebates and discriminations and the pillage of the public by unfair rates gave rise to the demand for public regulation of these public utilities. For a quarter of a century or more we have endeavored to regulate and as yet we have not accomplished any great results.

In Alaska we have a free hand, a clear start. And to-day the Alaska railroad bill focuses attention on the question, What shall we do with our railroads? It is a problem that presses constantly more and more strongly for solution.

Note the wonderful increase of railroad traffic in 20 years from 1890 to 1910.

We have heard much in this debate about the sufficiency of public regulation of privately owned railroads. As yet such regulation is but an experiment, and a most uncertain one as to results at that. Hon. Charles A. Prouty, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, said at the annual meeting of the National Association of State Railway Commissioners in 1912:

The United States is trying out an experiment that has never yet been worked out successfully in any country of the world. It is trying to work out the problem of controlling railroads built and maintained by private capital but which are under regulations which are fixed and controlled by the public.

It has never been worked out to an end, but, in my judgment, it has been tried out sufficiently to give some substantial ground for doubt as to whether the problem can be worked out that

The great factors in the problem are rates and service.

As to rates, we have not as yet really begun to solve the problem. We have, through the Interstate Commerce Commission and our various State commissions, made war on discrimination between points or between individuals, and to a very limited extent as to discrimination between industries. We have, however, not as yet given a hearing to Mr. Ultimate Consumer. I have often heard shippers declare that they did not care how high the rates were so long as they were not personally discriminated against. So long as the rate does not exceed "what the traffic will bear" and is not discriminatory, shippers are satisfied and pass it along to Mr. Ultimate Consumer. He has not been a party to hearings before these commissions and he has not been considered, but before the question is finally solved he must be considered.

There is to-day a concerted movement among shippers and business interests of the country in behalf of the 5 per cent advance in their rates which is asked by 50 of the railroads. If this increase is granted the 5 per cent is not to be paid by these interests that are supporting the demands of the railroads, but will be paid by the consumer. It will be another 5 per cent added to the products of the farm and the factory to be paid by the laborer in the city, who already complains as to the high cost of living, and will be made the basis of further demands for reduction of tariff duties.

Government regulation in this country has many obstacles to surmount, but two of them loom specially large just before us. First, the squeezing of the water out of the corporations controlling in order to fix a basis for rate calculation; and, second, a readjustment of rate-regulating authority as between State and Nation, in order that justice may not be lost in the twilight zone. Intrastate and interstate commerce are so inextricably related that they can not be logically and thoroughly rated separately. If the problem is ever to be worked out to a complete solution by rate-regulating commissions we must have a system of rate courts much like our Federal judicial system, in which the Interstate Commerce Commission would be the supreme court and the State commissions would be similar to the Federal district courts.

Railway authorities have insisted that the value of the railroad has nothing to do with the question of proper railroad rates. Mr. R. S. Lovett stated before the railroad securities commission:

No railroad company has ever undertaken to base rates on the value of its property and no railroad man has ever attempted to make rates according to the value of the railroad. * * * Rates must of necessity be the same on all competing railroads, and yet we know that the value of such railroads varies greatly.

Such, however, is not the theory of Government regulation. The United States Supreme Court has declared "the basis of calculation is the 'fair value of the property' used for the convenience of the public (Smyth v. Ames); or, as it was put in San Diego Land & Town Co. v. National City, 'What the company is entitled to demand in order that it may have just compensation is a fair return upon the reasonable value of the property at the time it is being used for the public.'

We are about to provide for a valuation of the railroad properties of the country by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the La Follette law. At this point I wish to call to your attention a signed statement by Senator LA FOLLETTE which appeared in La Follette's Weekly of January 31 with reference to the proposed regulation of the issue of railroad securities. This statement seems to me to be incontrovertible, and if our railroad problem is ever to be worked out successfully along lines of Government regulation these wise words of warning from Senator La Follette must be heeded. So far as the Senator's statement has reference to the railroad problem, it is as follows:

ment has reference to the railroad problem, it is as follows:

Not since he became President has Mr. Wilson recommended legislation so important and far-reaching as in his message of January 20.

Though expressed in general terms, the President forecasts the scope and purpose of the proposed measures. The message has been followed by a tentative introduction of four bills. There is to be a fifth, designed to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to regulate the financial operations of the railroads.

Believing that the enactment of legislation to regulate the financial operations of interstate railroads would be a serious mistake, I set forth below some of my reasons for that belief. I do this in obedience to strong conviction and in the hope that the administration may yet be persuaded against pressing that recommendation.

President Wilson's recommendation for the control of the financial operations of interstate railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission will be very popular, I have no doubt, at the outset. It is not unusual to find advocates for Government control of capitalization among those who have studied the railroad problem. Ten years ago I entertained a like view. I can therefore understand the President's attitude of mind and sincerity of purpose upon this subject. Further study and reflection have changed the views which I then entertained for reasons which I can but imperfectly set forth within the compass of a single editorial.

As one goes into the relations of the railroads to the public, he first sees the vice of overcapitalization as an excuse for excessive transportation charges. It is quite natural that he should first think of correcting the evil by limiting the capitalization to the actual value of the railroad property; but it is inevitable that he should ultimately realize that the true relation of the common carrier to the public, and the true principle upon which that relation should be controlled does not impose upon the Government the necessity to regulate the complex financial affairs of the great national railways. In short, all interests with which the public is in any way concerned can be fully protected by a simple and logical method—a method which protects the people nagainst obligations and responsibilities which they can not escape if their Government attempts to regulate the financial operations of the great interstate trailways.

What interests have the public in the control of the railroads?

As to interstate transportation, the people of this country are interested in (1) the character of the service rendered and (2) the price which they must pay for that service; they have no other or further Interest.

What obligations do these railroads owe to the public?

which they must pay for that service, Interest.

What obligations do these railroads owe to the public?

Government charters the common carrier, clothes it with the sovercign power to take private property—even against the consent of the owner—for the carrier's use. The acceptance of this sovereign power operates to dedicate the property of the railroad to a public use, and imposes upon the carrier the obligation to so use its property as to furnish to the public adequate service, impartial service, and to render such adequate and impartial service at reasonable rates.

What duty does Government owe to the public regarding the common carrier?

It has created the common carrier. It has invested it with power to take private property for a public use. From its nature, within a limited area along its course, the railroad is a natural monopoly. Possessed of this great power, the railroad might ignore its obligations and oppress the public. Government is therefore bound to see to it that the creature it has clothed with its sovereign power shall discharge its public obligations. It therefore becomes the duty of Government to so control this carrier monopoly that the public shall be guaranteed adequate service, impartial service, reasonable rates. The interest of the public goes no further. The obligation of the Government goes no further.

To acquit itself of this obligation to the public, what is the Government required to do?

It must of necessity ascertain the fair value of the property which the common carrier uses for the public. It owes no duty to the public to undertake the regulation of the financial operations of the railroad. The Supreme Court has well said that—

"If a railroad corporation has bonded its property for an amount that exceeds its fair value, or if its capitalization is largely fictitious, it may not impose upon the public the burden of such increased rates as may be required for the purpose of realizing profits upon such excessive valuation or fictitious capitalization."

The fair valuation of the property is the true basis. The public need not concern itself with all the villatines of overcapitalization, which abound in the history of every railroad in the country.

To execute its public trust, the Government must, in addition to ascertaining the fair value of the property, know exactly the amount of money which the common carrier expends in maintaining the property used for the benefit of the public. It must also know exactly the cost or outlay of the common carrier in operating the railroad.

Having ascertained these three important essentials—the fair value of the property, the cost of operating the property—the Government is then prepared to enforce adequate services, impartial services, and reasonable rates. To this end it must make rates sufficiently high to pay the operating expenses, to meet the entire cost of maintenance, and enough in addition to insure an adequate return upon the fair value of the property of the common carrier.

It is charged with no duty to become legally or morally answerable.

an adequate return upon the fair value of the people of carrier.

It is charged with no duty to become legally or morally answerable for the financial juggling of the railway management. The rate which it fixes may indirectly operate to restrain overcapitalization; it may even tend to squeeze the water out of excessive stock and bond issues already set afloat; but neither the railroads nor the dealers in railway stocks and bonds have any cause for complaint. The railroads have no right to exact from the public rates high enough to pay interest and dividends upon stocks and bonds which exceed the fair value of the property.

stocks and bonds have any cause for complaint. The railroads have no right to exact from the public rates high enough to pay interest and dividends upon stocks and bonds which exceed the fair value of the property.

No warrant or excuse can be offered for the Government's assuming any responsibility regarding capitalization of common carriers for the protection of investors. The purchase by an individual of railroad stocks and bonds as a speculation or for investment is solely a matter of option with the purchaser. He buys in his own right and at his own risk. Upon principle, the Government owes no other or different obligation to the man who buys railroad stocks or bonds than to the man who buys Standard Oil or Tennessee Coal & Iron stocks and bonds, or to the man who purchases a horse, a house and lot, or a farm.

But should the Government assume the responsibility of controlling the issue of railroad stocks and bonds it will enter upon an undertaking fraught with grave dangers to the public, an undertaking certain to impose unnecessary and unjust burdens upon transportation.

Ten years ago every railroad in the United States would have taxed its resources to the last limit to resist conferring upon the Government power to superintend and regulate its financial operations. To-day they hail with satisfaction and delight the recommendation for such legislation. And it is to be noted that the organs of Wall Street and the stock exchanges especially commend the proposed regulation.

The reason is obvious. The railroads of the country carried their fictitious capitalization to a point where the public, within the last few years has grown suspicious of the soundness of these securities. Values rapidly declined. Various schemes were devised to boost the market. They failed. Then came the bold demand for some Government action that would rehabilitate these depreciated securities and stimulate the languishing business of the stock exchanges. To this end, Mr. Aldrich, five years ago, brought forward an ingenious plan t road, to make the transportation charges high enough to "protect me securities which it has authorized railroad companies to place upon the market.

But more than this: When the Government, through its commission, has authorized a railroad to make an additional issue of bonds or stocks it will, in effect, have validated all the issue of stocks and bonds then outstanding.

If it were a proper function of government to "superintend and regulate" the issue of railroad securities in which private parties speculate or invest, it would be vital that the commission charged with this great responsibility should know the true value of the property of the railroad underlying such securities. But the Interstate Commerce Commission does not possess such information. It will be years before the commission will have completed its valuation of the railroad property of the country under the law recently enacted. When the commission has finished that great economic undertaking and submitted its tentative findings, its work will, under the law, have to be tested and tried out in the courts before it becomes even sufficiently stable to form a basis for fixing railroad rates and charges.

In the meantime, is the Interstate Commerce Commission to be called upon to guess at the value, and upon that "guess" to authorize the railroads to increase their capitalization?

The commission has been completely at the mercy of the railroads in every contest over rates where the companies have raised the question that the rate fixed by the commission would not permit the earning of a reasonable return upon its property.

And now it is proposed to require the commission to decide upon the facts presented to it that securities may be issued, upon which the railroads are "henceforth to be supplied with the money they need."

Referring to the fact that the railroads had control of all evidence regarding the value of their properties and that it was powerless to meet that evidence in any contest involving the value of railroad property, the Interst responsibility of determining whether railways shall issue, it may be, hundreds of millions of stocks and bonds which will become a permanent burden upon transportation. Consider the lasting wrong which this may work upon the public. The railroads will always have the advantage. They are more familiar with the case as it is to be presented than the commission can hope to be. They have a powerful organization. They have an army of trained experts, engineers, statisticians, accountants, masters of railway finance, and special counsel.

If the railroads win wrongfully in a rate case, it is a hardship upon the public. But an erroneous decision fixing a rate too high may be corrected. The case may be reviewed. The excessive rate may be lowered in a subsequent proceeding. But a wrongful decision by the commission, allowing the railroad to issue millions upon millions of securities which are at once thrown upon the market, is an everlasting burden upon the public—an everlasting injury to the people.

Whoever buys railroad securities now buys at his own risk. Whoever buys securities upon the issue of which the Government has set the seal of its approval will, in good morals, hold that the Government must, under all circumstances, maintain railroad rates so high as not to impair the value of those securities.

The moment that investments are made in securities authorized by the Government, that moment property rights in those securities become fixed. The commission may find that it has been misled, that it has grossly blundered. But its mistake is irrevocable. It is not the simple question of having temporarily imposed a hardship upon a community. It is a case of having inflicted an irreparable injury upon an unoffending public.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE

If we do not work out to a satisfactory solution this great problem along lines of Government regulation, the American people must either give up, declaring that they are powerless to protect their own welfare and secure their own advancement, or they will be obliged to turn to Government ownership with all of its responsibilities and its intricacies.

We know that this Nation of ours will never rest until they have solved this problem, and while we are still struggling to work it out along the lines of Government regulation I believe it is wise and prudent that we should study and experiment likewise along the line of Government ownership. Therefore I am heartily in accord with the proposition contained in this bill now before us, which permits us to begin at the beginning with such an experiment.

In this discussion we have heard much from various gentlemen as to possibilities of failure for Government ownership. These gentlemen have pictured to us various instances of Government extravagance. I notice, however, that they have been equally silent as to the failures of private ownership and the wonderful success of Government effort in building the Panama Canal following scores of years of failure of private effort.

Private effort in the business world is not uniformly successful. More than 90 per cent of men engaged in business register a failure at some time in their careers. And nowhere in all the fields of enterprise does failure score more frequently than in that of transportation. Inefficiency, graft, scandal, and crimes of finance all are found on almost every page of the railroad history in this country. To-day the American people are staggering along under the whole load, lacking the service the country needs, and still asked to pay yet more for that which it has not had and does not get.

So active in our ears are the pleas of the financiers who would make possible payment of dividends upon watered stocks that we hear little of the other side of the story—of responsibilities not met, of the public interests smothered rather than served by private initiative and individual genius.

If we but take thought, numerous and striking instances in confirmation of what I say must occur to us. The public prints are continually recording them. We all know of them in our own personal observation and experience.

Representing a portion of the State of Michigan, I call to your attention such a case, and I would ask any of you cheerful economic doctors of the school of Government regulation to take a look at the patient and tell us in Michigan what sort of a prescription you have to offer that will hold out any hope of a proper recovery.

The largest mileage operated by any one railroad system in the State of Michigan is that operated by the Pere Marquette Railroad system. Upon the proper operation and management of this line with 1,700 miles of road in my State are dependent in large degree the development and progress of a great portion of that State. It does a great intrastate and a great interstate business in the carrying of passengers and freight. It was for many years a profit-producing enterprise, and it played a large part in the development of the State in other days. In 1901 it owned 1,706 miles of track and its bonded debt was less than $30,000,000. To-day it is in the hands of receivers; its bonded indebtedness has, with very little increase in mileage, grown from less than $30,000,000 to nearly $80,000,000. Its present management are unable to satisfy the demands of the public for service, the demands of the employees for wages, the demands of stockholders and bondholders for interest and file mands of stockholders and bondholders for interest and dividends, and have been known to issue bonds in order to satisfy the demands of the State for taxes. With improved efficiency the rule of the day in all lines of business, with constantly increasing demands for transportation facilities everywhere, and with a constantly developing country tributary, this great railway system, under private ownership and Government regulation, presents a spectacle of failure which should give food for thought to any who think that solution of the problem by Government regulation is an easy matter. For a third of a century we have had our Interstate Commerce Commission, with constantly increasing powers. Since 1907 we have had our State railroad commission, with powers expressly granted to it to regulate rates and to require service. To-day, with the question of rates practically untouched, the question of service seems to be beyond the power of anyone to remedy.

The alleged service being given the public by the Pere Marquette Railroad Co. is a scandal and a disgrace to an age which prides itself upon its industrial efficiency. Large portions of my district are dependent upon this system for transportation facilities, whether it be of persons, mail, or freight. Just as one instance out of a multitude, let me quote the following from a protest filed with the Postmaster General November 16 last, by Dr. J. H. Burley, president of the village of Almont, Mich.:

Please give Almont, Mich., better mail facilities. Our freight service by the Pere Marquette Railroad is getting absolutely unreliable. Conditions of tracks so poor that wrecks occur almost weekly, delaying mail from 36 to 48 hours. Winter coming on, conditions will be worse. Have had only 7 mails in last 8 days. Three days no mail. Kindly give us service from Detroit, by way of Romeo, by Detroit United Railway and carrier from Romeo to Almont, 9 miles.

Permit me to state that the investigation of the Post Office Department sufficiently substantiated this complaint, so that the department acceded to the request and have made contracts to send mail into this railroad town for 9 miles over wagon roads.

The following are expressions from secretaries of boards of trade with reference to this subject:

The freight and passenger service on the Pere Marquette Railroad is not all that could be desired. I believe the officials of the road will agree with us as to this. However, they are regularly meeting with us and cooperating, we honestly believe, for an improvement of the situation, as far as the means they have at their command will allow. It is certainly our impression from observation of the past year, as far as the personnel of the road is concerned, they are doing their very best to serve the public. The writer believes you are familiar, from your official experience, with the financial handleap the road is burdened with and probably have some well-defined ideas as to a remedy.

The passenger service is fairly good. The freight service is, however, about as poor as it could possibly be and maintain any semblance to an organized transportation unit. We have at this time a number of complaints before the Michigan railroad commission complaining of the absolutely rotten freight service rendered by the Pere Marquette under the present management. There is no question but what this service, or rather lack of it, is due to the failure of cooperation by the different departments and by the employees, who are underpaid and dissatisfied. I can cite you any number of specific instances where from 1 week to 10 days would be consumed in transit of L. C. L. shipments moving less than 100 miles. I believe that some of their heads of departments are making an honest effort to improve the service, but, through lack of cooperation, their efforts do not amount to much.

For several years past large sections of my district served by this road have found the freight service insufficient, resulting in great congestion of freight, delays in shipments, and loss to farmers and stock and produce buyers, who were unable to take advantage of the best markets. Within a few weeks this insufficient freight service has been cut in two in the Thumb district of Michigan, and where the rule was before a freight train each way every day, there is now but one every other day. The following is from the Huron County Tribune of January 30 last:

FREIGHT SERVICE IS INTOLERABLE, SAY SHIPPERS—BAD AXE DOES NOT GET THREE P. M. TRAINS A WEEK, AS PROMISED.

GET THREE P. M. TRAINS A WEEK, AS PROMISED.

The freight situation in Bad Axe has become intolerable, say many shippers and merchants. Last week a shipment of goods by the Clark & McCaren Wholesale Grocery Co. is reported as having taken from Monday till Friday to get to Elkton, 10 miles distant. Bad Axe was supposed to have an outgoing P. M. freight frain every other day, but is not getting even this triweekly service, poor as it would be. The fact is that the freights can not get here three times a week. Every station along the road, both on the Saginaw and Port Huron divisions, is so congested with freight and it takes so long to load, unload, and switch cars that neither can make its destination the same day it starts from either Saginaw or Port Huron. Frequently, it is said, the trains tie up overnight along the way on account of the 16-hour limit for the crews, and instead of the trains coming in one day and going out the next, it takes about two days to make the trip each way. This does not make much more than three round trips in two weeks.

Local railroad men are powerless to relieve the situation. They are obeying orders, and are not to blame.

Harbor Beach is said to be even worse off than Bad Axe, and according to reports a delegation of business men from that town to P. M. headquarters in Detroit received little encouragement and but scant courtesy.

Some local shippers have gone over the heads of the P. M. officials

Some local shippers have gone over the heads of the P. M. officials and taken up the matter of freight injustice with the commission at Lansing.

Here is another expression, from the Harbor Beach Times of

THESE ARE DAYS OF RETROGRESSION—PRESENT RAILWAY TRAIN SERVICE WOULD MAKE GOOD MATERIAL FOR JOKESMITHS—EVERY TRAIN IS ON THE SAME KIND OF SCHEDULE USED WHEN DAD WORE COPPER-TOED

Well, sir, there is nothing about our present misfit of a train service over the Port Hope & Palms division of the Pere Marquette Railway over which to "crow." When our citizens were informed, Monday morning of this week, that during the previous night the train-moving map on the best-paying 18 miles of trackage of the entire system of Michigan's big system, the Pere Marquette Railway, had been changed and the new conditions took us back to the days of years ago, when Harbor Beach had no factories and the system was a narrow-gauge affair, they were loud in comments; but right here is where we suggest that your foot be placed upon the soft pedal, so far as the subordinate officers are concerned, for in making this backward movement they simply are carrying into action orders received from the head office.

During the week our people have been treated to all kinds of "auld lang syne" stunts in the line of railroading, including a passenger train of coaches of 1862 vintage pulled by an engine running backwards and other numerous and freakish ideas; yet all is the result of a system that has been taken into Wall Street, robbed, and left by the wayside for dead, now in the care of nurses, trying to keep the poor thing supplied with activity sufficient to make it a matter of sympathy for the consideration of the State railway commission.

In the Detroit Tribune of January 31 appear charges framed

In the Detroit Tribune of January 31 appear charges framed by representatives of striking employees of the road to the effect that the roadbed and rolling stock of the road have fallen into such bad condition that lives and property are in constant jeopardy, that 75 engines on the said railroad were, between May and September last, condemned by Government inspectors as dangerous, and approximately 50 more have been withdrawn from service by Government inspectors because of their defective and unsafe condition. These parties further cite as an example of the demoralized and impoverished condition of the railroad the following telegram from J. W. Mulhern, superintendent of the Grand Rapids division, under date of June 25, 1913, to the engineer of No. 9:

This is authority for you to proceed on No. 9, engine 189, without a

And these parties further allege that said engine, with a passenger train, was thereupon run 550 miles without a whistle, contrary to the laws of the State.

Complaints are now pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission from Mr. Burr B. Lincoln, deputy dairy and food commissioner of the State of Michigan, and other parties alleging insufficient service, as to delays in transit in connection with shipments of live stock, and other demands for service. Occasionally through this course the individual case is cared for, but the thousands of instances occurring each day where injustice is done the public by the failure of this railway system to furnish the service to the public that it is entitled to do not reach the commission and are not adjusted, and if they did reach the commission the commission could not procure the relief to which the complainants would be entitled.

It is not a matter of individual inefficiency. It is not a temporary situation which will work itself out. It is not a case of simple failure of a public agency to perform its duty. It is a serious and urgent situation, which exists by reason, not of willful failure, but of absolute inability of a public agency to perform its duty under the conditions with which unrestrained private ownership has surrounded it. The engineers and the brakemen and the conductors and the station agents and the section men and the men in the car shops and the train dispatchers, and even the division superintendents and the general superintendent and general manager and those officers of the public, the receivers, are not to blame for the present situation, wherein the State of Michigan, which has a right to expect service from the Pere Marquette Railroad Co., is, instead, being hampered and held down in its industrial development by the failure of that privately owned and publicly regulated public utility to give service. The Pere Marquette corporation is carrying water in its stock to the amount of many millions of dollars. Money that the public have paid to that corporation for service has been diverted to the pockets of speculators and gentlemen in high finance. June 30, 1913, this corporation had outstanding, according to its own report to the Interstate Commerce Commission, capital stock to the amount of $28,415,200, and a funded debt amounting to $75,750,720. This gives a total of $107,250,720 on which this corporation seeks to pay interest or dividends. At the same time almost all of the property of this corporation is taxed in Michigan under a law which provides for its assessment at its cash value the same as any other property. A few hundred miles of the lines are outside of the State, and, of course, are not included in the valuation placed upon the Pere Marquette by the State board of assessors; but these do not amount to more than a few millions of dollars in value.

The State board of assessors have just determined the value of the property of this company in Michigan for 1913 at the same figure as for the previous year, namely, $25,600,000. The company will, no doubt, appear before that board, as they have done every year heretofore, and protest that their property is being assessed at more than it is worth, and then will go home and try to figure out some way of paying interest and dividend on an amount equal to three times or more its assessed valuation. It is to be noted that the State board of assessors in Michigan in making their assessment of railroads are not groping in the dark and making random guesses. In addition to other data before them, they have always before them that splendid piece of work, the appraisal of the railroad property in Michigan, which was secured by that pioneer progressive of progressives, Gov. Hazen S. Pingree. This appraisal was made under the direction of Prof. M. E. Cooley, an engineer of national reputation, and Prof. Henry C. Adams, later statistical cian of the Interstate Commerce Commission and now an advisor of the new Republic of China. In this appraisal the value of the Pere Marquette lines in Michigan in 1900 was placed at

These suggestions are sufficient to indicate that a situation exists in connection with the Pere Marquette system that presents a great problem for solution, and one that it is urgent for the welfare of my district and of my State, and of your Nation as well as mine, that it should be solved soon, not by any temporary restorative on the 5 per cent plan, but by a thorough cure. I shall at a later time present a resolution asking a thorough investigation of the Pere Marquette Railroad Co., its financial history, and its present physical condition, and the nature of the service it is rendering the public. I am making these observations here to-day as a reminder both of the fact that private ownership, self-regulated, has failed to keep its trust with the public, and that as yet Government regulation of privately-owned public utilities has not really begun to solve the problem. I have not made any reference to Government aid for the Pere Marquette, although that is a factor in the situation. We are now making our start in the development of Alaska, hoping to build up there a civilization worthy of our country. Before we have given large sections of new territory to private individuals to secure railroads for the development of such territory. I believe this is a most propitious time to experiment with a newer method of building our own railroads and securing our money back out of the lands and owning our own railroads to be forever operated along lines best suited to the welfare of Alaska. [Applause.]

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, this bill provides for the construction by the United States Government of about 800 miles of railroad in Alaska, the road to be built between such points and over such routes as may be determined by the President of the United States.

The purpose of this measure is to connect one or more of the open Pacific coast harbors on the southern coast of Alaska with the navigable waters in the interior of Alaska and with the coal and copper fields of Alaska, thereby aiding in the development of the agricultural, mineral, and other resources of that Territory.

Authority is given in the bill to borrow $35,000,000 on United States bonds, said sum to be used in the construction of said railroad.

This bill is based on the report of the Alaskan Railroad Commission, which was appointed about two years ago for the purpose of investigating the Alaskan situation, with the view of determining the best policy to be pursued by the National Government in the development of that country.

Alaska was purchased by the United States Government from Russia in 1867 for $7,200,000. Alaska contains 590,000 square miles of territory, being about one-fifth the size of the United States, and has a population of about 50,000 people.

Ninety-nine per cent of the Territory of Alaska is owned by the United States Government and the balance is largely owned by what is known as the Alaskan Syndicate, or the Morgan-Guggenheim interests.

Alaska has at the present time about 450 miles of railroad, the Alaskan Northern, the Copper River & Northwestern, the White Pass, and the Yukon being the principal lines.

According to all authorities Alaska is rich in natural resources, a veritable treasure house, so valuable that no man has assumed to be able to name the sum that would represent her total wealth.

It is claimed that Alaska has more gold than California and Colorado, more coal than West Virginia, Ohio and Pennsylvania, more copper than Michigan, Arizona and Montana, large deposits of iron ore, extensive forests, considerable quantities of the finest marble, and various other minerals in abundance.

From the standpoint of agriculture, strange as it may seem to those who have looked upon this country as a sea of icebergs, Alaska is of considerable importance, as she is located in a latitude similar to that of several countries of northern Europe, where in a territory smaller than that of Alaska 10,000,000 people are supported by the products of the soil.

Mr. Chairman, after reading the hearings of the two committees having this bill in charge, and after listening to the able and exhaustive debates on the floor of this House, it would appear that there is a general agreement on both sides as to certain vital points fundamental in the correct solution of the problem before us.

There is little dispute as to the natural resources of Alaska. All agree that she is unquestionably rich in copper and coal; that she has valuable forests—in fact, that her natural wealth is so great that she practically stands alone as the one great storehouse of the world whose treasury door has yet to be It is conceded that if Alaska is to be developed, if unlocked. her great natural resources are to become available, railroads are necessary; that railroad construction in Alaska by private individuals ceased in 1906 when the Government withdrew from entry the public lands of Alaska; and that private enterprise will build no more railroads in Alaska under present conditions.

I agree with the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT], who has just addressed the House, that the problem here presented is a very simple one, being nothing more or less than a plain business proposition.

Here is the situation: The people of the United States own 99 per cent of a Territory equal in size to 10 average States of this Republic, a Territory wonderfully rich in natural resources, for the development of which railroads are a necessity.

Shall the railroads be built by the people who own the Territory and its natural resources, or shall the people turn over to private individuals the resources of the Territory as a bonus for the construction of the necessary railroads?

The advocates of this bill insist that as a plain business proposition the answer to this question must be that the people of the United States should construct the necessary railroads for the development of their own property, especially so when to act otherwise would mean that the property must remain undeveloped or else be surrendered to private individuals to be developed and exploited as they should determine.

While it has been the policy of our country in the past to give to private individuals bonuses in the form of land grants for the purpose of inducing them to engage in the construction of railroads in undeveloped countries, it is now generally agreed on all sides that the said policy resulted in a criminal waste of the people's property and in the building up of a far-reaching and gigantic monopoly of our natural resources.

The United States Government owes a duty to Alaska and to her citizens to assist in the development of that country. All agree that the assistance most needed is a railroad. Now we, as Representatives of the people of these United States, should either provide for the development of Alaska by means of Government-owned railroads or else we should permit the Guggenheims, the Morgans and their allied interests to acquire the natural resources of that country-in fact, to become the owners of the country—in order that private enterprise will construct the railroads necessary for the development of the country.

I do not know what other Members of this House may do, but I do know that I will not vote to turn over to a few vast natural resources that belong to and should be preserved for the use of all the people.

We have been told many times during the course of this debate by the opponents of the measure that Alaska has no use for railroads; that the railroads already constructed in that country are not paying and never will pay; and that the National Government will lose every dollar it will invest in

The opponents of this bill argue that the proper way to treat Alaska is to take the Government's hands off of her natural resources, lease or give them to private individuals, and then this bleak, cold, barren country will suddenly become able to support railroads which private individuals, after gobbling up all of her resources, will kindly construct.

It would seem that if private enterprise will find it profitable to build the necessary railroads for the development of Alaska, in case the resources of that country should be leased, given or sold to them, that the people of the United States, being the owner of said resources, can well afford to build the necessary railroads, with every probability of the venture being a financial success, especially so since the people, through the Government, can build the road for money that will cost but 3 per cent, I while individuals will use money upon which from 7 to 10 per cent will be expected.

It has long been the policy of this country to aid in the development of new territory, by giving financial assistance to private individuals who are engaged in constructing what might be called the pioneer railroad trunk lines necessary for the development of the country.

The United States Government has given more than 150,000,000 acres of public domain to private individuals for railroad construction in our western States. It is safe to state that more than $1,000,000,000 have been donated by the National, city, county and State governments for the building of the great railroads extending from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean.

I stated that this bill provided for the continuance of an old policy of our Government as regards railroad construction in new territory, with this marked difference, however, that in the past the Government of the United States and the people along the right of way, after furnishing the money for the construc-tion of railroads, kindly turned the roads, when built, over to private individuals, while under the terms of this bill, the Government having furnished the money for the construction of a railroad, will retain the ownership of the road for the benefit of all the people.

It is no disparagement of the resources of Alaska that it should be necessary for the National Government to build the railroads necessary for the development of that country. It is very doubtful if our western country, with its rolling plains, its fertile valleys, and great mineral resources, would even to this day have been developed to any great extent if the National Government, the different city, county, and State governments along the rights of way had not come forward and furnished the money needed for the construction of the necessary pioneer rail-

There appears to be a difference of opinion as to the agricultural possibilities of this Territory. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris] in his speech against this bill was rather sarcastic in his references to Alaska as an agricultural country. I desire to compliment the gentleman from Oklahoma on his speech, because it was an able one, wherein every argument or possible argument against the bill was presented with much force and skill.

No matter what the opposition to this bill may say, the fact nevertheless remains that Alaska has agricultural possibilities, and while it is true that the country may never be an exporter of agricultural products, there can be no doubt at all, judging from the reports of the United States experimental stations located in that country, and from the agricultural possibilities of other countries similarly located geographically, that Alaska will be able to produce agricultural products sufficient to support a population of at least 10,000,000 people.

Mr. Chairman, in passing this bill we are not entering upon a new policy; neither are we committing ourselves to the policy of the ownership and operation of railroads of this country by the National Government. We are simply continuing an old policy of governmental assistance in the construction of railroads for the purpose of developing a new country.

It is argued by the opponents of this measure that it will establish a precedent which will eventually lead to the Government ownership and operation of all the railroads of the United This argument has been the strong talking point of almost every speech made in opposition to the measure.

As a general proposition I am opposed to the Government ownership and operation of our railroads, and as I view the situation to-day I will continue to be opposed to the proposition until it is proven by a fair trial that Government supervision and control of railways is a failure.

Is it possible that the gentlemen who oppose this bill, because, claim, its enactment into a law will be the first step toward the ownership by the Government of all the railroads of this country, are willing to sacrifice nature's richest storehouse of natural resources, now the property of all the people, by turning it over to private individuals as the price of railroad construction in Alaska, in order that some future advocate of Government ownership of railroads will not be able to point to the Alaskan Government-owned railroad as a reason for the Government ownership of all the railroads of this country?

The question of Government ownership of railroads is not before us at this time, and when that question does come squarely before Congress for solution, a Government owned and operated railroad in Alaska may or may not be a strong argument in favor of Government ownership of railroads of the United States

I am going to support this measure, not because I believe in a Government-owned railroad, but because it appears that railroads are necessary for the development of Alaska; that private capital will not build the railroads unless we pay the price demanded, a surrender to private enterprise of the natural resources of that country; and because only through the Government building this road will it be possible for the people to continue as owners of Alaska.

Alaska, through her representative [Mr. Wickersham], is here pleading for the passage of this bill. She is asking that this bill become a law, because the history of that country under the domination of the Guggenheim and Morgan syndicate is almost without a parallel in modern times. It is a history of strife, of lawlessness, of corruption, inspired by private greed, a greed that has paralyzed every effort of those who happened to be outside of the pale of the Alaskan syndicate, to develop the country, and Alaska is asking for a Government-owned railroad because she desires that her natural wealth be developed for the use of all the people of this country, and not for the benefit of the Alaskan syndicate.

The construction of an Alaskan railroad by the National Government will eventually be of great benefit to the people of the United States. Alaska even to-day, undeveloped, is of considerable commercial importance to this country. We had more trade with Alaska in 1913 than with China and many other countries, and there is every indication that with the proper railroad facilities our trade with that Territory will become an important item.

We need the coal and copper of Alaska in our industrial development. Especially do we need the coal of Alaska for the use of our Navy and our growing eastern commerce. In case of an eastern war that would require the presence of our Navy in the Pacific Ocean, Government coal mines in Alaska would mean an annual saving of millions of dollars to the Government in the cost of fuel.

Practically all the natural resources of our country outside of Alaska are held in the iron grasp of monopoly. It will be for the benefit of the people to have under the control of the General Government the coal, copper, and other mineral resources of Alaska, to be used, if necessary, in combating and destroying the gigantic monopoly that now controls the coal, iron, copper, and other natural resources of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to allow myself to speculate upon the agricultural possibilities of Alaska or upon the probable value of her vast coal and copper deposits or upon the effect the passing of this bill will have upon the question of Government ownership of railroads in this country.

Suffice for me is to know that Alaska is marvelously rich in natural resources, and that the only way by which those resources can be preserved for the use and benefit of all the people is for the Government to build a railroad as provided by the terms of this bill.

Mr. O'HAIR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if I should vote the way I would like to on this matter, and should follow the feelings and dictates of my heart, I would vote for this bill. You can not read the history or talk with people who have come down from Alaska without feeling a great deal of admiration and sympathy for them. But I apprehend that it is not sympathy they want—it seems to be a railroad at the present time.

I have always observed that when a mining proposition, or an oil proposition, or any kind of industrial proposition is brought to you from a far-off land, a place that is inaccessible, where the prospective stockholders can not go to investigate, the greatest success in selling the stock is generally experienced. [Laughter.]

From all I can hear and from conversation with gentlemen, there are mighty few Members of this House who know anything about Alaska first-hand.

Since this matter was called up I have been seeking out those who know something about it, or said they did, and reading a few books. Every man that I have seen and every book that I have read written by men who live in Alaska booms the country. Of course they do if they live in Alaska. If I lived in Alaska, I would tell all the good things about it and I would leave untold everything that would not get votes for this railroad.

I have made up my mind, gentlemen, that if Alaska is worth enough to deserve a railroad somebody will build it, and if Alaska is as worthless as the gentleman from Oklahoma says it is nobody ought to build it. It has been true of every country on the Western Hemisphere, at least, that no place that has been worth developing has failed up to this time to have a railroad built by private enterprise.

I hear a good deal of talk about the Panama Canal and of railroads to the far West. Now, those are entirely different propositions. This is a developing proposition. It is not a proposition to build a road from here to Alaska, where we are going to begin to take out the gold, coal, oil, reindeer, and the polar bears. This is not a proposition to build a railroad over barren wastes, impassable swamps, or bleak mountain passes, but it is a proposition to build a railroad of 700 miles from somewhere on the coast to the interior of Alaska for the purpose of developing more than a half million square miles of land. That is the proposition pure and simple.

The Government dug the Panama Canal not for the purpose of developing swamps and tropical jungles on the Isthmus of Panama but for the purpose of enabling the commerce from everywhere to be transported through this barren waste to the ports and markets of everywhere.

The proposition is world-wide and world developing. It was necessary for the Government to build the canal, because the project was so uncertain and stupendous that no private enterprise would ever be organized on a large enough scale to accomplish the undertaking.

The Government donated vast areas of land to private enterprises in order to induce them to construct overland routes across the great western deserts to the Pacific coast, and those transactions have been a subject of scandal for the past generation; but those enormous grants and gifts were not made for the purpose of developing any country, they were made for the purpose of constructing lines of communication across vast sweeps of worthless desert in order to reach a country which was worth developing. No one ever supposed that the Government was willing to contribute or did contribute to the construction of railroads for developing the far Western States—that was accomplished by private enterprise, for the simple reason that those States were worth developing. I have never known of a project for the development of any valuable natural resources that was not eagerly sought by investors.

Whenever the Government goes into the business of building railroads for the purpose of developing parts of our country it will inevitably be called upon to take over other enterprises, such as the mining of coal, the Government ownership of irrigation, the Government ownership of manufacturing enterprises, and then Government ownership will reach a condition of complete centralization. No other condition on the face of the earth can so effectually and completely break down individual liberty as a centralized Government, with all business matters under its ownership; and until I become convinced that the philosophy of the Socialist is correct I shall never cast a vote in favor of the Government going into any business of a com-mercial character or nature. It is repugnant to our form of government. The true function of constitutional government is to enact just laws and to fairly and impartially administer them. Let the citizens own and manage the wealth of the Nation and let a just and righteous Government, honestly administered, compel an honest accounting of that guardianship; in other words, the Government should never lose control over any commodities, products, or resources under its jurisdiction for the purpose of enforcing a square deal. It is only within the last few years that the people of this country have awakened to the fact that this Government can and must and will control the railroads, the telegraph, the telephone, the express companies, the trusts, combines, and monopolies.

Alaska has to-day about 35,000 white people and 30,000 natives. It covers an area of about 590,000 square miles. There are about 20 sections of land in Alaska for each of the men, women, and children of the white race. In the last 10 years Alaska has produced about $200,000,000 worth of gold and about $200,000,000 worth of fish and seal furs. There are about 26,000 miles of seashore, including islands and inlets, and the navigable streams furnish about 3,000 more miles of water frontage in Alaska. Most of the land available for agricultural purposes is near the seashore and along the rivers. Lack of railroads can not be said to have retarded the growth of the population along the shores of the ocean and the rivers, and yet there is about 1 mile of frontage for every white person in Alaska along her navigable waters. You might build 10,000 miles of railroad in Alaska, but you would not improve the facilities provided by nature for transportation along her navigable front. The Government has done wrong, criminally wrong, in withdrawing the great coal fields and forests of Alaska from entry and virtually locking up the resources of that great rich country.

I do not believe the charge that this country is a barren waste. I do not believe the assertion that Alaska can not be made profitable as an agricultural country. The evidence is too convincing for me not to believe that this country, when proper laws are put into effect, will become a great mining country, with vast resources from its agricultural products, and capable of feeding millions of people. Under the conditions that exist to-day, if you were to string Alaska with lines of roads as thick as they are in Illinois, you could not transport 1 pound of coal;

you could not get a stick off of the timber reservations.

The railroad is not needed to bring the fish and seal furs out of the country, because these products are already on the ocean front, and it surely would not appeal to the business sense of anybody to build a railroad at an expense of $40,000,000 to haul the gold out of Alaska. If a railroad were built as is proposed by this bill, it would serve only about 10,000 to 15,000 people; so the proposition resolves itself into an investment of at least $1,000 for each white person in the Alaskan Territory in order to build 700 miles of railroad; and those who say the country would settle up and a great many more people would go there by the building of this railroad have not a peg to stand on, when it is shown that those miles of ocean frontage and river bottom lands fronting on navigable streams are more accessible to-day and always have been than the interior would be with unlimited railroads. The most level and most fertile part of Alaska lies along its coast line and along its rivers, yet every white citizen living in Alaska could go fishing on a navigable shore and have no person to disturb his solitude within 1 mile of him, unless it were a native that he took along with him to cut bait. Now, there is something wrong with Alaska, and before I vote to spend $40,000,000 of the people's money on a questionable venture I intend that the promoters of this scheme shall prove their case to the satisfaction of reasonable men. We have spent $400,000,000 digging the Panama Canal, and I think the Panama Canal is all right, but I would rather have had $400,000,000 spent on internal improvements for the benefit of the "folks at home." It is very high sounding to talk about digging canals and spending great quantities of money for the benefit of the world, but I think the time has come in this country when it is the duty of every man who has an official position to bend his energies to caring for the welfare of Americans first,

It is a good deal like a man who buys his wife a piano when she needs a cook stove. The piano is all right, but unless you can afford both the cook stove should be bought first. So the proposition to build an Alaskan railroad is all right if we had plenty of money to first improve our public highways, to enlarge and deepen our rivers, lakes, and harbors, to promote irrigation, and to establish Government hygienic conditions for both man and beast.

I would rather know how to prevent hog cholera than to have a railroad stretched clear from the Pacific Ocean across Alaska to the North Pole, and yet we are having trouble in getting an appropriation of one-half million dollars to find out how to prevent and cure hog cholera. The loss to the farmers for each year from hog cholera is approximately $100,000,000. Forty million dollars will build 8,000 miles of fine macadam highway in the United States. This highway, extending across the continent almost three times, would pass in front of the doors of from 20,000,000 to 30,000,000 people. Which would you rather have, the railroad in Alaska, so far away that no one of us and probably few of our children will ever see it or use it, or 8,000 miles of macadam highway at the very threshold of onethird of our people?

It is the same old proposition. Some of the Members of this House are like a great many people who hear a glittering tale for the first time. They are willing to spend their money like a lord on something that is shrouded in mystery, and especially are they willing to spend it when it is somebody else's money. I never voted to spend one cent of American money away from America. I do not think I ever have in private or public life voted against spending American money in developing and promoting internal resources and internal improvements. people who pay the bill are entitled to the benefit and not the world or somebody away off in an inaccessible territory

Alaska will never be developd by building a railroad; but if you will give Alaska a chance by repealing obnoxious, selfish, paternalistic, restrictive laws that now throttle and fetter her, there is no doubt in the world but that she will take care of herself, and the goddess of Alaskan prosperity and the spirit of Alaskan progress will unfurl their banners to the Arctic breezes and inscribe a declaration of commercial independence by the light of the Aurora Borealis.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, a week ago I spoke upon this bill at some length and do not therefore desire at this time to trespass at any great length upon the patience of the committee.

There seems to be general agreement that if there are sufficient resources in Alaska to support permanently a considerable population of home builders it is wise to open this great empire and develop those resources. The first step in the opening of any country to settlement and development is the establishment of adequate means of transportation; that is, by the construction of railroads.

It is evident that private capital will not be invested in railroad building in Alaska unless the owners of that capital are given such opportunities for profit and such control over the resources of that country as seriously to interfere with the rights of the present owners, the people of the United States.

Alaska must not be turned over to exploitation by private special interests. Therefore, if railroads are to be built and the rights of the people of the United States still preserved, those railroads must be constructed and operated by the Government; there is no other logical conclusion to these premises.

But whether the Government of the United States or any other entity should build railroads in Alaska depends upon the resources and possibilities for development of that country; if these resources and possibilities are shown to exist, the necessity for Government action in the construction of a railroad for the development of its own property and the benefit of the people of the United States is perfectly clear. The important question to be determined, therefore, is, What are the facts as to the resources and opportunities for development in Alaska?

Consequently I desire to submit some further observations, as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. Mondell] would say, upon the question of the resources of Alaska, and I therefore, because of lack of time, ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, under the leave just granted submit certain additional facts as to the resources of Alaska. As to the great value of the minerals, fisheries, and furs of this mighty Territory there can be no doubt.

On an investment of $7,200,000 Alaska has given us in return since 1867 (and by far the greater portion since 1899, or only 14 years), as shown in the reports of the United States Geological Survey, Director of the Mint, and other official documents:

Gold	$213, 018, 719
Silver	1, 824, 364 13, 377, 194
Copper	355, 489
Other minerals	993, 119
Fisheries and furs	240, 830, 168
	000 0E0

A faint idea of what Alaska may be expected to do when it shall have adequate means of transportation is given by the following table:

Value of articles shipped to the United States in 18
Fish: Salmon, canned	907, 242 589, 529 41, 662 283, 339 728, 554 129, 375 77, 159 90, 831 18, 012 1, 000, 261

Total Some doubt has been expressed during this debate as to the possibilities of stock raising in this far northwestern country. On this point the annual report of the Alaska agricultural experiment station for 1910 says:

periment station for 1910 says:

Cattle, horses, hogs, sheep, and angora goats can be raised nearly or quite as well in Alaska as in other of the most northern countries. Theoretically the Galloway cattle are specially well adapted to this climate, but nearly all the well-known breeds have now been produced here: Herefords, Durhams, Ayrshires, Holsteins, and Jerseys grow as rapidly and mature as quickly as in other countries. What are not to be kept for milk are usually killed from October to December, after they are yearlings, so they are fed sliage or hay only one winter. They can then be made to dress from 500 to 600 pounds each. The heifers are nearly or quite full grown and giving milk frequently before they are actually 2 years old. All the pure breeds and those of mixed breeding apparently do as well in Alaska as elsewhere.

Comparatively few coits have yet been raised here, but enough to prove conclusively that they grow quickly, are perfectly healthy, very hardy, and make as large and as valuable horses as could have been produced from the same stock farther south. Horses can be raised much more cheaply than would be generally supposed. Pasturing is still so abundant it costs practically nothing, and food and shelter for coits and young horses are actually needed only a very small portion of the time, some winters scarcely at all. Horses have repeatedly wintered well with little or no care where no other domestic animal would have survived.

That the introduction of the reindeer into Alaska has wrought

That the introduction of the reindeer into Alaska has wrought wonders and that this branch of stock raising possesses im-mense possibilities is shown by the following from a recent report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson:

In Lapland (on an area of 14,000 square miles) there are about 400,000 head of reindeer, sustaining in comfort some 26,000 people. There is no reason why Arctic and sub-Arctic Alaska should not sustain a population of 100,000 people with 2,000,000 head of reindeer.

Lapland sends to market about 22,000 head of reindeer a year, the surplus of her herds, which, at an average weight per carcass, dressed, of about 150 pounds, is equal to 1,660 tons. As this is a surplus over and above the wants of the population, the value of this industry in the near future as a source of meat supply from lands otherwise comparatively valueless for other purposes becomes apparent. The present herds are nearly all located on the western coast from the Kuskokwim to Point Barrow, a distance of some 800 miles, but in the near future this industry will extend over the entire Alaska Peninsula and many northern localities not yet occupied. Those best acquainted with surrounding conditions estimate that Alaska has grazing grounds sufficient to support from 10,000,000 to 20,000,000 head of stock.

On this interesting subject the New York Independent of February 2, 1914, states that-

February 2, 1914, states that—

Fifty thousand thrifty reindeer are already grazing on Alaskan wilderness pastures as contentedly as if their ancestral home had been there. They are, however, the quite recent descendants of some 15 or 20 animals that were imported from Siberla about 20 years ago by way of experiment. It was a good day for the north when the fathers of the flock first landed. Never has any animal done more for man or more remarkably accomplished a country's material salvation.

The native peoples of the Alaskan coast country were in a bad way before their animal benefactors came to help them, and were eking out a very poor existence. There was nothing in the way of a permanent industry to keep them profitably busy, and the food supply was very often dangerously near the vanishing point. Dr. Sheldon Jackson, a missionary working among them, conceived the idea of importing from Siberia a few head of reindeer, which were giving the people of that country, under similar natural conditions, both work and food. Shortly afterwards the United States Government took up the experiment, and now all the reindeer herds in Alaska are under Government control. They are let out on favorable terms to the native herders, and already the profits have been 300 per cent on the original investment.

There is no fear of starvation in Alaska now, as once there was, for the reindeer gives an unfailing supply of meat and milk. Its skin makes a warm and serviceable clothing. And the responsibility of taking care of the herds has developed the natives from rather shiftless hunters and trappers into men of regular and thrifty habits.

Concerning the agricultural possibilities of this great peninsula.

Concerning the agricultural possibilities of this great peninsula, Mr. Seth Mann, from whose report the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Saunders] very properly quoted, says:

[Mr. Saunders] very properly quoted, says:

The Government agricultural stations in various parts of Alaska have demonstrated many of the agricultural possibilities of the respective regions where they are located; and in the neighborhood of Fairbanks there are a number of commercial farms and gardens which are operated at a profit and which supply the needs of the city of Fairbanks and the neighborhood and also the demands of the steamer traffic. Excellent strawberries are grown, and vegetables are raised without difficulty. The growing of various grains is as yet largely in the experimental stage. But crops of wheat, oats, barley, and rye are matured on the Government farms.

The summer season is short for the maturing of wheat, but there is much less difficulty with the other grains mentioned. Some hay is cut by individual farmers. The interior of Alaska is more favorable for agricultural purposes than the regions along the coast since there is more sunshine in the interior and more cloudy and rainy days upon the coast. However, the city of Juneau is supplied with vegetables from local farms situated from 1 to 12 miles away from the town. It does not appear that Alaska will ever export the products of agriculture, but it seems fair to assume with the growth of population which will result from the building of railroads, roads, and trails and the development of the mineral resources of the Territory that larger areas of arable lands will be brought under cultivation, and that the needs of the people of Alaska will be supplied from its own fields.

Relative to fruit-growing the report of the Alaska agricultural experiment stations has this to say:

Fortunately for Alaska there are some fruits which do well here. The currant and gooseberry and the raspberry thrive and fruit as well as anywhere on earth. The currant and the gooseberry are both indigenous to Alaska. The red currant is found more or less abundantly in the mountain valleys throughout the Coast Range. It is particularly abundant in Kenai Peninsula, where the writer has seen large bushes loaded with fruit, which was much appreciated by the bears, as evidenced by their tracks and their voidings. A dwarf red raspberry grows abundantly in the interior valleys and on the lower slopes of the hills as far north as the Arctic Circle. The writer once was a member of a party of berry pickers less than a degree from the Arctic Circle, and the raspberry was the most abundant fruit. Alaska has other berries equally good. The blueberry of the interior is so abundant in places that the slopes look blue at a distance, and the native cranberry is also found in low, moss-grown thickets in the interior and in the swamps in the coast region.

Another recent report makes the following statement with reference to the growing of vegetables:

reference to the growing of vegetables;

It is possible to grow magnificent vegetables in all parts of Alaska, except on the tundras and mountains. To Alaskans they are no novelty, but to strangers unacquainted with the country they are a constant surprise. They include all the products of the Temperate Zone in America, and the bureau has in its exhibit potatoes, turnips, beets, rutabagas, sugar beets, carrots, parsnips, kohl-rabi, celery, rhubarb, radishes, onlous, cabbage, cucumbers peas and even tomatoes, and in one or two very favored spots even melons have ripened. The samples both for size and quality will compare with the markets of New York, although grown more than 1,500 miles north of that city. Every family can have its garden, which will not only furnish the necessities of life but will beautify the home with a wealth of flowers. These facts have become so well known that notice of them has practically disappeared from the reports of the agricultural stations, but as the potato is so important an item in the daily menu every effort is being put forth to secure those varieties best adapted to the climatic conditions of rainfall and sunshine.

If further evidence were necessary to prove the real agricultural value of this wonderland of wealth, the following from the report of the Alaska Railroad Commission would seem to be conclusive:

conclusive:

* * * Of the agricultural importance of the Tanana Valley there can be no question. The district can not be expected to raise products which will be valuable for export, at least under conditions which can now be foreseen. It should, however, become in part self-supporting by raising a large amount of the food material now imported from outside. Though cattle raising has not been carried on to any extent, yet it is probable that this can be successfully done in competition with meat brought in from the States. The snowfall is, however, heavier than in the upper White River Valley, and some winter feeding would be necessary. Whatever experience may show in regard to raising cattle, there should be no question that a local dairy industry could be developed.

* It may be said that the Susitna, lower Tanana, and upper Kuskokwim Basins contain farming and grazing lands unrivaled in extent and fertility in Alaska, and which in time to come may furnish a food supply for export.

The data presented shows that the United States possesses in Alaska a frontier Territory of great size and of wonderful industrial possibilities. The commission believes that its climate is favorable to permanent settlement and to agriculture; that its mineral resources are vast and as yet but little exploited; that its population is sparse, but only by reason of its inadequate transportation facilities; and that its people are of the same type of hardy pioneers that have carried the United States frontier to its present limits.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, if no other gentleman desires to speak, I want to use but a moment and to ask, incidentally, permission to extend my remarks in the Record.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVENPORT. The reason I do that, Mr. Chairman, is because during the debate a number of gentlemen have seen fit to criticize in a way that I know they did not mean any harm by; but, at the same time, a greater portion of their argument is directed against the Guggenheims, and my congenial friend from Alaska [Mr. Wickersham] and I engaged in several colloquies during the delivery of his speech on that proposition.

Now, I know there is nobody in this House who is going to be offended in one way or another. If it had not been for the fact that Oklahoma exists and that my colleague [Mr. Ferris] and I are from Oklahoma, and that the Guggenheim firms exist, a great portion of this argument would never have been in this RECORD.

But what I am trying to say is—so that my genial friend will know—is that he did not think in 1908 that the Guggenheims were so bad, because he was willing to serve them in the capacity of their attorney. And I wanted to state that while Mr. Wickersham is here, because he has occupied prominent positions in Alaska, and after he had lived there he solicited employment from Mr. Birch for the allied interests.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I deny that proposition.
Mr. DAVENPORT. All right. I will read the correspondence.
Mr. WICKERSHAM. Wait a moment. Your statement was that I "solicited employment."

Mr. DAVENPORT. He submitted a proposition as to what he would work for them for, and in the bottom of the letter he asked where Mr. Jarvis was. He sent his regards to Jarvis in the Birch letter, and when he decided to run for Congress he wired Jarvis that he desired to run for Congress, and asked where Birch was. I want to be fair. But in 1908 he did not think the Guggenheims were as bad as they are now.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Have you the original papers? Mr. DAVENPORT. No. I have a letter from Birch saying that the copy is an exact copy of the letter.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr.

DAVENPORT] seems to be intimately associated with the Guggen-heims just at this time in his correspondence.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I never saw any one of the Guggenheims but Senator Guggenheim, in the Sixtieth Congress, and I never saw Birch. But when the gentleman said what he did, immediately got busy and did write to Mr. Birch, at New York, and asked him if it was a fact, because a gentleman in this House, whose reputation is good, said it was a fact. And I present a copy of the letter, which I will read:

JAMES WICKERSHAM, ATTORNEY AT LAW, Fairbanks, Alaska, April 8, 1908.

STEPHEN BIRCH, Esq., Seattle, Wash.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. You ought to read the other letter. Mr. DAVENPORT. I will read Birch's letter in reply to Mr. WICKERSHAM. Have you not the letter that was written to me first?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No, sir.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Then you have not the correspondence? Mr. DAVENPORT. I have a copy of Mr. WICKERSHAM'S letter that he wrote, and knows that he wrote, and which he does not deny.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. You ought to make a complete statement by reading both letters.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I will make a complete statement, and I do not wish to misrepresent the gentleman, either. I wanted the gentleman to be present, so that if it was not true he could deny it; for if the Guggenheim representatives were as bad as he had pictured them, I might think they put up a job on me. I wanted to know whether it was true or not. The letter says:

My Dear Mr. Birch: Your letter of March 17 has been received, and I hasten my answer that it may catch the last mail out over

I regret that I can not meet you in Seattle the latter part of this month, because one can make one's ideas plainer in couversation than by writing, but since the opening of the April term of courts prevents it, I shall briefly state the matter by letter.

I have entered upon the practice of law here, and represent some of the most important interests in the Territory, and the outlook for returns is satisfactory; still I long for the fleahpots of the "outside," and would accept an offer from your allied Alaska interests to act as their general counsel, but not in any subordinate capacity. I will accept a three years' contract at $15,000 per annum with offices in Seattle and office force and maintenance. Upon that sort of arrangement I would devote my time exclusively to their interests and give them the best service possible. My opportunities here, however, are so good that I could not afford to give them up for less than a three years' contract with you. with you.
Please advise me by wire if anything is done in connection with this offer and it may be thus arranged.
Remember me kindly to Capt. Jarvis.
Very truly,

JAMES WICKERSHAM.

And then, on June 23, 1908, this message was sent by the gentleman from Alaska:

[Telegram.]

Signal Corps, United States Army, Fairbanks, Alaska, June 23, 1908.

Capt. D. H. Jarvis,
Northwestern Steamship Co., Scattle, Wash.:
I intend to run for Congress. Where is Birch?
JAMES WICKERSHAM,

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Now, what of it? Mr. DAVENPORT. I simply offer it to show that he did not think the Guggenheims were so bad in 1908. Mr. Wickersham had gone off the Federal bench January 2, 1908, and on April 8 this correspondence was going on. That is all I care to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The Delegate from Alaska [Mr. Wicker-

SHAM] is recognized.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Now, Mr. Chairman, the letter which the gentleman has read is a correct copy of a letter that I wrote. I wrote it in answer to a letter which was written to me by Mr. Birch, and if Mr. Birch or the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Davenport] had desired to be fair, either with me or with the House, they would have put both letters in the RECORD, because then it would have been easily discovered-

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I stated to the gentleman that I did not have his letter.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Certainly; the gentleman did not have it, or he would have put it in, I suppose. But if the gentleman had been as anxious to be as fair with me as with the Guggenheims he would have got the other letter.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I was just as anxious as the gentleman. After I had made my speech the gentleman howled "Government or Guggenheim," and that is why I sought the investigation.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes; that is correct, and I howl again; and I say now that the demonstration that the gentleman has made here exhibits the power of the Guggenheims on this floor to do things which are wrong.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I have never seen the Guggenheims, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Oh, the gentleman has had a great deal of correspondence with them lately.

Mr. DAVENPORT. No; I have not had any.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Not at all. If that correspondence was properly published down in the gentleman's district, he would have a lot of trouble about it.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I will say, Mr. Chairman, on this floor that I wrote this letter and got this reply. The gentleman's statement is unfounded. He can make any statement he wants to down there in my district and in Alaska in regard to me, and I can stand on my record at home and abroad just as well as he can.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. The gentleman has not read the letter

. that he has that he wrote to the Morgans.

Mr. DAVENPORT. The Morgan letter was published in the Senate, but that was not the Guggenheims'. Senator LIPPITT used the letter over there.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRISON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 48) to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Edmund Buck, H. R. 26854, Sixtysecond Congress, and James M. Fink, H. R. 24215, Sixty-second Congress, no adverse reports having been made thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10084. An act to authorize the changing of the names of the steamships Buckman and Watson.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as fol-

To Mr. Bailey, for 10 days, on account of important business. To Mr. Sharp, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

To Mr. Foster, indefinitely, on account of service on the committee investigating the Colorado mining strike.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows

Almighty God, breathe upon us the gentle and refining influence of Thy holy spirit. In the midst of all conflict of interest and clash of opinion may we be enabled to keep the unity of spirit in the bond of peace. Grant us that grace of heart and life upon which a true foundation of manhood may be builded. Give to us the spirit that creates and seals forever the blessed bonds of friendship. Give to us passionate, ardent patriotism, that our lives may be given, may be consumed, in the interest of the great commission that Thou hast committed to our hands. For Christ's sake. Amen.

Resolved, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide for the appropriate marking of the graves of soldiers and sailors of the Confederate army and navy who died in northern prisons and were burled near the prisons where they died, and for other purposes," approved March 9, 1906, and continued in full force and effect for two years by joint resolution approved February 26, 1908, and for the additional period of one year by a joint resolution approved February 25, 1910, and for the further additional period of two years by a joint resolution approved December 23, 1910, is continued in full force and effect for two years from this date; and the unexpended balance of the appropriation made by said act of March 9, 1906, is continued and made applicable for expenditure during the additional period of two years herein provided for: Provided, That hereafter the provisions of said act shall include and apply to the graves of Confederate soldiers and sailors lying in all national cemeteries and cemeteries at Federal military stations or localities throughout the country: Provided further, That the compensation of the commissioner shall be fixed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Delaware if he knows how much of the original appropriation has been expended?

Mr. DU PONT. I understand that it has all been used but $50,000. That remains unexpended, and it is the object to reach that amount.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the passage of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DU PONT. I also report back adversely from the Committee on Military Affairs the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 48) to continue in effect the provisions of the act of March 9, 1906 (Stat. L., vol. 34, p. 56), and I move that it be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

swered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution be read. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolu-Intion.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 260) submitted by Mr. Norris on the 3d instant, as follows:

Mr. Norris on the 3d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be requested to reopen its examination of the affairs of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. and to make a further investigation of the financial transactions of said company, with a view of ascertaining:

First, What became of the funds of said company wrongfully invested at fictitious values in the various enterprises and corporations mentioned in the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 2384, ease No. 4845, entitled "The New England investigation in the matter of rates, classifications, regulations, and practices of carriers," submitted May 20, 1913, and decided June 20, 1913.

Second. Whether the person or persons authorizing such investment of the funds of said company and the person or persons receiving the benefit thereof are liable to punishment under existing laws.

Third. Whether under existing law such funds so invested can be recovered on behalf of the stockholders of said company.

Fourth, What legislation, if any, is necessary to prevent the recurrence of similar transactions.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, to begin with, I desire to modify

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, to begin with, I desire to modify the resolution on page 1, line 7, by striking out the word "wrong-fully," and in the same line, after the word "invested," by striking out the words "at fictitious values," so that that part of the resolution will read:

First. What became of the funds of said company invested in the various enterprises and corporations—

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to make a statement regarding the resolution? Mr. NORRIS. There will certainly be no objection to the Senator making a statement, but I wish to make one myself, and then, I presume, the Senator will have ample opportunity to be heard.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator from Nebraska modify his resolution by simply striking out the words he has stated?

Mr. NORRIS. By striking out those words.
Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad the Senator has done that. Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it will be observed that this resolution does not propose a new investigation, but that it asks the Interstate Commerce Commission to reopen an investigation which they once made of the affairs of the New Haven Railroad Co. The investigation was concluded and an opinion rendered, as stated in the resolution itself. It was begun on the 20th day of May, 1913, and decided by the commission on the 20th day

In my judgment the opinion rendered by the commission, through Mr. Commissioner Prouty, shows on its face that the investigation was not complete. It does not show what became of the funds that were invested in various enterprises and in various institutions and corporations in which this railroad company was interested.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. NORRIS, I yield to the Senator. Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have been absent a few days and have not very closely followed the proceedings of the Senate. I will ask the Senator from Nebraska at this point, if the Senator pleases to answer, why this investigation was not pushed to a conclusion by the Interstate Commerce Commission? Was it because of the lack of funds?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I am not fully advised as to that; but, in a general way, my idea is that one of the reasons was that some of the witnesses were not cross-examined because of the fear that there might thereby be immunity given to them. The investigation was not made upon any resolution similar to this, but was a general investigation of the New England railroad situation. On page 578 of the opinion rendered by Judge Prouty, in referring particularly to this company and its capitalization, he uses this language:

talization, he uses this language:

June 30, 1903, the total capitalization of the New Haven Co. was approximately $93,000,000, of which $79,000,000 was stock and $14,-000,000 bonds. The mileage then operated was 2,040 miles. On June 30, 1912, the capitalization, excluding stock premiums, was $417,000,000, an increase of $324,000,000, while the operated mileage was 2,090 miles, an increase of 50 miles.

The bonds and notes of the New Haven Co. had been during this period ordinarily issued at not less than par. The stock was sold at considerably above par. About $21,000,000 of the stock reported by the New Haven Co. as outstanding had been, in fact, issued to the New England Navigation Co., one of its subsidiary companies, by which it was held, so that this stock is still-virtually in the treasury of the parent company. Disregarding this stock, treating its notes and bonds as issued at par and including the premiums upon capital stock which has actually gone into the hands of the public, the New Haven received during the nine years under consideration from the issue of stock and securities about $340,000,000.

While the New Haven operated 2,040 miles in 1903, it only owned of this operated mileage 438 miles. During the nine years this owned mileage was increased by about 800 miles, and the New Haven Co. expended approximately $40,000,000 in acquiring this additional owned mileage. It expended during the nine years something over $90,000,000 upon its railroad for betterments and equipment, making a total of $136,000,000 devoted to its railroad property proper.

This would leave the sum of $204,000,000, which in nine years had been expended in operations outside its railroad sphere. This fact of itself is a most significant one, which, standing alone, might well require explanation. Attention is here directed to some of the purposes for which and the manner in which this vast sum has been invested.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to say-and I thank the Senator for the courtesy of permitting me to say it during his remarksthat I do not propose to antagonize this resolution, nor do I think the Senators from New England will antagonize it-that is my impression-but I am constrained to ask the Senator why it is that the Interstate Commerce Commission, with such great powers and with a free hand, as it seems to me, should halt an investigation it had been making, so that it becomes necessary for Congress to pass a resolution requesting it to continue that investigation? It seems to me anomalous, and I ask the Senator simply for information on this point. If that great commission has made an investigation that is incomplete and has halted it for any purpose, it occurs to me that it has ample power, ample funds, and ample assistance, clerical and otherwise, to take up the investigation and push it to a conclusion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the commission have sufficient power and sufficient authority, and I am not able, perhaps, to fully satisfy the Senator as to why they discontinued the investigation. I want to say that, after I com-menced to investigate the matter, I waited for what seemed to me to be quite a long while for some steps to be taken in the matter, until I became convinced, from reading this report and from subsequent charges that were made, to which I am going to refer, that it was a matter of national importance and one that ought to be given the fullest publicity before the American people. Whether that is sufficient reason, it is the main reason, I will say to the Senator, why I concluded to introduce this resolution and why I believe the matter ought to be investi-

I will show, I think, further on from this report that the opinion of Judge Prouty demonstrates on its face that the investigation was not complete. He starts out by considering a large number of financial transactions. I am only going to refer to one or two of them as a matter of illustration. He takes up the Rhode Island Co .- that is one of the subsidiary companies, one of the organizations in which a large amount of this money was invested—and discusses it at some length, giving some of the details of the transaction; but, unless it is desired, I do not care to go into the details, for the reason that I do not care to take up the time of the Senate in that respect. I want, however, to read the conclusion regarding this Rhode Island Co. which Judge Prouty reached, which is found on page 579 of this document:

Representatives of the New Haven Co. earnestly insisted that this company had not watered the stock of the Rhode Island Co.—

It was claimed on the one side that the stock of this company had been watered, and it was claimed on the part of the New Haven people that they had not watered it. Judge Prouty says further:

and this, strictly speaking, is true. The improvement company turned in the water and the New Haven Co. converted that water into wine. In whatever aspect the transaction is viewed the New Haven Co. gave $13,500,000 for nothing.

The fictitious value that was put into the company was put in before the New Haven Co. bought it in this case. Then Judge Prouty discusses—and I am going to refer to that only briefly-the New York, Westchester & Boston Railway, which is one of the subsidiary companies in which a large amount of the stockholders' money was invested. Says Judge Prouty:

The New York, Westchester & Boston Railway is a four-track electric road extending from White Plains, N. Y., to a terminus at Harlem River, a distance of slightly over 20 miles. This road was built and owned by the New Haven.

Further on he says:

The books of the New Haven Co. afford but little information as to the actual process of construction. Between November 2, 1906, and May 1, 1907, that company deposited with J. P. Morgan & Co. $11,000,000, which was turned over from time to time to the Milbrook Co.

The Milbrook Co., I might say in passing, was another corporation, with a capital stock of $1,000. It is a remarkable fact, however, that they paid the attorneys who drew up the articles of incorporation—I have forgotten the exact amount, but a very large amount of money for drawing up the papers.

Mr. CUMMINS. Fifteen thousand dollars.
Mr. NORRIS. I am informed by the Senator from Iowa that the amount was $15,000.

That company-

That is, the Milbrook Co .-

gave its notes to Morgan & Co. for the amounts received by it, and these notes were passed over to the New Haven Co. and were its vouchers for this money. It does not appear what the Milbrook Co. was, nor what its relation to the New Haven Co., nor its financial standing.

other sums were subsequently advanced by the New Haven Co. at various times and in various amounts. The Milbrook Co. figured largely in these transactions, and there was also a City & County Contract Co. The sum of $275,000 was paid to Oakley Thorne and Marsden J. Perry to secure the release of some contract. There was a merger of the Port Chester Co. and the old New York, Westchester & Boston Co. Into a new New York, Westchester & Boston Co. Into a new New York, Westchester & Boston Co. Into a new New York, Westchester & Boston Co. This Inter company issued its 4½ per cent mortgage bonds, which were turned over to the New Haven Co. in the amount of $18,000,000. Of these, $17,200,000 were guaranteed by the New Haven Co. and sold to J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. for $16,000,000, a discount of $1,200,000, which the New Haven still carries as an asset upon its books.

After going into some more details, he concludes by saying:

After going into some more definis, he concludes by saying: Here, therefore, is an enterprise which has cost the New Haven Co. $12,000,000 in excess of the value of its property upon its own showing. Again the question arises, What has become of this $12,000,000? In case of the Rhode Island Co. it was possible to locate the corporation, if not the individual, which had ostensibly obtained the money, but in this case it is impossible, from anything upon the books of the New Haven Co., to do this, even approximately. So far as those records go, this money has vanished into thin air.

I might go on at a great length quoting to you from this opinion, bearing out the conclusion reached by Judge Prouty, and citing various other illustrations he has given of the financial operations of these people; but I do not believe, at this time, at least, I will go further into that matter.

Subsequently to that a great deal of publicity was given and some charges made publicly and given wide circulation in regard to some of the things that Judge Prouty says are unknown; for instance, the details of the Milbrook Co. The New York World, in its issue of February 1, made some startling charges, in direct language, as to what had become of this money. I am not going to read all of those charges, nor go fully into the details, but I wish to read a few of them.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.
Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire if these charges, made openly, as the Senator suggests, have been denied by officials of the railroad company?

Mr. NORRIS. I have never heard of their being denied. It was charged in that issue of the World as follows:

That the Milbrook Co.-

That is, this same company, with a capitalization of $1,000incorporated under the laws of New York, with a capital of $1,000 and debts apparently aggregating $15,000,000 on the day of its charter, made an agreement with the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. to borrow unlimited sums on demand notes authorized by the board of directors of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co. to complete the New York, Westchester & Boston electric line.

That is the railroad referred to by Judge Prouty.

That the transactions between the Milbrook Co. and J. P. Morgan & Co. were concealed completely in "account No. 2," kept in the offices of J. P. Morgan & Co. and not in the books of the Milbrook Co.

Further on it is said:

That between October, 1906, and November, 1907, the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. advanced to the Milbrook Co. on demand notes, at 5 per cent, $11,155,000 of money belonging to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., for which J. P. Morgan & Co. acted as fiscal agents.

That deposited with J. P. Morgan & Co., in September, 1907, as collateral to secure the loans, amounting then to about $11,000,000, made on the demand notes, were securities with an actual value of only $200,200, according to a certificate handed to the accountant of the Milbrook Co. by J. P. Morgan, jr.

That on the money loaned by J. P. Morgan & Co. to the Milbrook Co. J. P. Morgan & Co. collected 5 per cent interest, although the money had been deposited with them by the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co.

That Thorne and Perry—

The same firm mentioned by Judge Prouty-

The same firm mentioned by Judge Prouty—as promoters, president, and treasurer of the Milbrook Co., had an agreement with J. P. Morgan & Co. giving them (Thorne and Perry) 7½ per cent of all of the New Haven money disbursed by them in promoting the affairs of the Milbrook Co., which controlled the New York, Westchester & Boston enterprise.

That this 7½ per cent was split between Thorne and Perry and W. H. Chesbrough, a dummy director of the Milbrook Co., Thorne and Perry taking 47½ per cent each and Chesbrough 5 per cent.

That J. P. Morgan & Co. would have apparently been compelled to assume the loss of the $11,155,000 advanced to the Milbrook Co. on the Westchester deal if the New Haven, of which the late J. Pierpont Morgan was the dominant spirit, had not assumed it.

That the only way that the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. could get back the $11,155,000 which they had loaned on notes to the Milbrook Co. was by unloading that company on the New Haven.

That the Trust Co. of America, of which Thorne was president and Perry vice president, got $50,000 for buying the stock of the New York Railroad & Development Co. and some of the Westchester enterprise and $50,000 for acting as transfer agents of the New York, Westchester & Boston Railway Co.

The New York Railroad & Development Co. was another subsidiary corporation mixed up in the building of this road. There were also several other corporations.

There were also several other corporations.

That the banking and promoting firm of Dick & Robinson, syndicate managers for the Westchester enterprise, marketed its securities, which were of uncertain value, receiving from $60 to $100 a share and securing a commission of 2½ per cent in cash and $1,500,000 in the stock of the Westchester Co.

That the promoters of the Westchester property bought and turned over to the Milbrook Co. bonds and stock which either had been sold at a nominal sum or given to politicians, promoters, and other persons who had apparently rendered no service nor paid anything for it.

That one C. H. Smith (identity obscure) got $2,100,000, one-half of which was in cash and one-half in stock, for assigning a contract to the City & County Contract Co. to construct the Westchester enterprise, which he had made three days before with the New York, Westchester & Boston.

Boston
That James P. McDonald got $375,000 for negotiating the same

That James F. accounts get $150,000 for $156,100 (face value) of contract.

That the Milbrook Co. paid $940,000 for $156,100 (face value) of stock of the New York & Port Chester Railway Co.

That the law firm of Stetson, Jennings & Russell (the Morgan firm) received $15,000 for drawing the incorporation papers of the $1,000 Milbrook Co.

That hundreds of thousands of dollars were paid to lawyers for services of uncertain worth.

That the Knickerbocker Trust Co. certified to the custody of 45,000 shares of stock, par value $4,500,000, when in fact it only held 7,000 shares, the par value of which was but $700,000.

That the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co., Messrs. Thorne & Perry, and the Knickerbocker Trust Co., in withholding the information from the authorized accountant of the Milbrook Co., tried to throw the responsibility for their evasion on Charles S. Mellen, then president of the New Haven, notwithstanding his protest against the acquisition of the Westchester project and the fact that he had voted against it.

That, including the $11,155,000 loaned by J. P. Morgan & Co. to the Milbrook Co., the New York, New Haven & Hartford, up to June 30, 1910, had dumped in excess of $21,020,074.74 of its stockholders' money into the Westchester enterprise.

That in the official validation report of the New Haven Railroad Co. the estimated actual value of the New Haven's actual investment in the Westchester enterprise, according to its own books, was figured at that time, June 30, 1910, at $12,066,921.18.

That, according to these figures, the difference between the cash paid through all agencies by the New Haven and the real value of the property received by it in return at that time was $8,953,172.50.

That of the $18,000,000 of the Westchester's 4½ per cent mortgage bonds turned over to the New Haven, $17,200,000 were guaranteed by that company and sold to J. P. Morgan & Co. for $16,000,000—a discount of $1,200,000, which the New Haven still carries as an asset on its books.

That is the same charge made by Judge Prouty in the opinion to which I have made reference.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska ield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield. Mr. BORAH. I observe that this resolution provides for "a further investigation of the financial transactions of said company, with a view of ascertaining," and so forth. As I understand, the Senator is now reading information which the Interstate Commerce Commission did not secure?

Mr. NORRIS. Some of this they did not secure. Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator informed as to why the Interstate Commerce Commission stopped its investigation at a certain point?

Mr. NORRIS. I went over that matter somewhat before the Senator came in. I am not fully informed; I do not claim to be able to tell why they did.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it is impossible to hear the debate.

Mr. NORRIS. In making a general investigation of the rail-road situation in New England, I had, I think before the Senator came in, read from the opinion in the case—

Mr. BORAH. I heard the reading from the opinion; but it occurred to me that if half of what is reported there is true and for all I know, it may be all true—there are some 8 or 10 people at large who ought to be in the penitentiary.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably.

Mr. BORAH. And it occurred to me that perhaps the Interstate Commerce Commission stopped at a certain point for fear they might place these people in a position where they would be granted immunity.

Mr. NORRIS. I suggested that I thought that was one of the reasons, at the time they made their investigation, if they did that.

Mr. BORAH. If this resolution should go through, and the Interstate Commerce Commission should proceed with the investigation, might not that very thing happen?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think so, Mr. President.
Mr. BORAH. I ask the question simply for information.
Mr. NORRIS. Of course, circumstances might arise in the investigation where that might be true. Personally, I believe that a great many of these transactions, some of which I am going to refer to in just a moment, would be shown without giving immunity to anybody who was any distance up the ladder in the New Haven concern. Some of them-in fact, most of them, I think-would be shown by an examination of the books. In that event, if anybody were given immunity it probshould be the bookkeeper; and as far as I am concerned I should not have any objection to giving him immunity.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield. Mr. CUMMINS. It is not unlikely that the commission went as far as it had authority to go under the law. The jurisdiction of the commission is measured by the law, and it may not have been able to reach circumstances that were simply evidence of a crime under a State law. I think, too, that a great deal of the testimony that was developed in that hearing is not included in the report.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that is true, too. they have a great deal of this information in their possession now. I should not be surprised if that were true. If it is true, of course it could be reported without further investi-

Mr. CUMMINS. I myself do not believe the Interstate Commerce Commission has any authority to investigate the question whether the directors of the New Haven road defrauded the stockholders of that road unless the investigation is allied in some way with the ascertainment of what would be a proper rate for freight as a proper charge for passenger service. have been now for years fully acquainted, in a general way, with the enormity of the capitalization not only of this company but of a dozen or more in the United States, because I venture to say this wretched history finds a parallel in the capitalization of a dozen of the great railroads of the United States, and yet we have done nothing to make it a crime on the part of the railway managers of the country to do the very things that the Senator from Nebraska is now pointing out. declined from time to time to confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to supervise the capitalization of the common-carrier companies of this country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, one of the objects I wish to attain by this investigation is the enactment of whatever legislation may be necessary to make impossible in the future what it is practically admitted has happened in the New Haven case. believe, as the Senator has said, we ought to have legislated along this line in the past. If by giving publicity to these allegations, in case they should be demonstrated to be true, we can bring about proper legislation to protect the country from a repetition of these things in the future, we shall have accomplished, it seems to me, a great deal-much more than the punishment of guilty persons in one particular instance.

Mr. CUMMINS. We shall have accomplished everything if we can stir the people and Congress into action in that respect; but while possibly we have not all the information that exists, we have enough to excite the interest of the people, and it is information that ought to excite the action of Congress. So far as I am concerned, I would a great deal rather that we should busy ourselves trying to enact a proper law than wait upon the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission in any further investigation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we shall not busy ourselves and get the right kind of legislation until the country fully auderstands the possibilities of wrongdoing under the laws as they exist now, if there are such possibilities; and that is one of the things I wish to determine.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—
. The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield. Mr. LODGE. I understood the Senator to say that a great deal of testimony has been taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission on these very points which has not been made public.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been told so.

Mr. LODGE. So have I. I understand that is the case. Does the Senator know why that was not printed with the rest?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it seems to me that there might be a very good reason why it had not been made public, and it seems to me there might be a very good reason why the Interstate Commerce Commission has not gone further. If there is a desire upon the part of the Department of Justice to punish those people who have been engaged in this transaction, there is good reason why they should stop where they have stopped.

I do not subscribe to the doctrine of forgiving all these trans A great many of them have undoubtedly occurred by reason of the ignorance of the law in a certain sense, not knowing just how far they could go and where they could stop; but such a transaction as this, if it be true, was a willful transac--a knowing transaction-a crime committed with malice aforethought, and there is no reason in the world why those men, if the facts be true, should not be punished; and I assume that the Department of Justice in its own proper time will undoubtedly proceed to punish them.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me, I agree entirely with that view. The reason why I asked the question was to know whether it would not be wiser for us to be sure about this thing before we force the hand of the Interstate Commerce Commission and possibly the Department of We may by resolution, unless we know what they are doing, compel them to disclose their case, which they are intending to prosecute. I know nothing about it. I do not know that that is the reason.

Mr. NORRIS. Ordinarily I think it would be a fair propothat this road made an arrangement with the Department of Justice by which its slate was to be wiped clean, the past forgiven, with the promise that if they would sin no more they should be allowed to proceed.

I wish to say in this connection that as far as I know the present management of the road is perfectly honest, perfectly honorable, and perfectly competent. I would not throw a straw in the way of interfering with that road developing and reaching again the position in commerce that it had attained before it was robbed. But that does not, in my judgment, offer any reason whatever why we should not punish those who have committed wrongs in the past, and why we should not know all the facts in connection with the matter, so that we may have the benefit of those facts in passing the proper legislation to prevent the recurrence of such things in the future.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will permit me, the present management of the road, I think, is just what the Senator has described. I do not mean by that to cast the slightest reflection upon the persons who have gone out, but certainly there is no man of higher character or more honest purpose, I believe, in the country than Mr. Elliott. Of course we do not want to throw any obstacle in the way of his trying to put the road in a proper condition. I am sure none of us desire that. But if these charges, which I do not attempt to prejudge, are true, they show that the stockholders of the company were robbed; if they are not true, their falsity should be demonstrated. That is the plain English of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I believe that is generally conceded.

Mr. LODGE. The only thing about the resolution which dif-ferentiates it from most resolutions is that it is an attempt at least to protect the rights of the stockholders. Usually all the suffering that has been brought has fallen upon innocent stockholders of the road. The suffering and injury done to hundreds of innocent people, people with very small means, in New England by the breakdown of the New York, New Haven & Hartford and the Boston & Maine have been very great. If these things can be proved and something be done, as the resolution suggests, to recover the money of those people taken in this way, it ought to be done. It seems to me that is the work, as the Senator from Idaho suggested, of the Department of Justice, and we ought to be very careful not to interfere with anything the Department of Justice is doing at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. I think, if we can rely any upon the undisputed reports that have been given in the public press, the Department of Justice is not attempting to do anything of that kind.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President-

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield in just a moment. I want to reply a little further to what the Senator from Massachusetts said. As I stated awhile ago, and I want to repeat it, as far as my knowledge goes the present management of the New Haven road is above criticism, at least I know nothing against it. I am acquainted with Mr. Elliott. I have talked with him about this proposition. If I were going to make a criticism of the present management it would be this-and in substance I have said the same thing to him-while we ought not to do anything to discourage the present management from building up that road and putting it on its feet again, a road that at one time was as good as perhaps any road in the entire civilized world, yet it seems to me that that management, if it is subject to any criticism, it is that it ought to be willing to give its assistance to an investigation of what occurred in the past, in order that the 40,000 widows and orphans who hold stock in the company may be recompensed for the losses that they have sustained. It seems to me, as I told Mr. Elliott, that it would give to the present management the confidence of the entire country if they would say, Uncover this matter and let the truth be known."

The objection to it that has been urged to me here is that if we give publicity to these facts the road might be damaged and perhaps go in the hands of a receiver; that we will injure its present financial condition by giving publicity to the robberies that have occurred in the past. But to my mind that is not a good objection. It is as if a man should rob you while you are asleep and take three-fourths of your property, and with his ill-gotten gains still in his possession say to you, "Now, keep quiet; if you will keep quiet, I will not take the other fourth that I permitted you to keep; you had better keep still and hold what I have decided to let you keep and see if you can not build up another fortune."

It strikes me there is another reason why this should be done, outside of the consideration of the interest of the stockholders. I am just as much interested in protecting them as any man can possibly be. Even though we would concede now that we will wipe the slate clean and say nothing of what has occurred in the past, because we believe now you have reorganized and sition to state that from the daily press we gather the idea | you are honest-if we should say that it would be an invitation in the future for any man who was capable of practicing sharp financial transactions through dummy corporations, through dummy directors, to rob any other railroad in the same way, and then come here and say, "While we have robbed you, we are going to be good in the future, and if you will let us keep what we have stoler way can take what is left and transfer. keep what we have stolen you can take what is left and try to keep yourself out of the poorhouse."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President— Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I want to say only a word further, that I may not be misunderstood by the Senator from Nebraska. The ultimate object the Senator desires to attain is one which I would cordially approve. The only desire I had in rising was to call his attention to what, it seems to me, might probably happen, unless the Senator is better informed, as he no doubt is, as to the program that is intended.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I am not informed.
Mr. BORAH. I notice the Attorney General stated in print, when the agreement with Mr. Elliott was made, that it did not include or cover any immunity for past offenses, criminal offenses, and so forth. That was printed in connection with the statement, and it followed the other statement in regard to it. Now, I can not conceive that the Attorney General would for a moment compromise those crimes.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not said he would. I am not making

Mr. BORAH. No; but he not only has said affirmatively he did not; but if he had not said that, it would be impeachable, in my judgment, to let such offenses go, if the information is in his possession.

The only thing I desire to call the attention of the Senator to is that by publicity we may frustrate the plan of the Attorney General in punishing these parties. I am one of those who believe that if these things be true, five or six of those men behind the bars in stripes would have the most tremendous moral effect on this country of anything we can conceive of. I do not believe that any legislation which we could pass would be so effective in this country as for the Government to show that because a man stands in a place of power financially he stands in no different position before the courts and the criminal laws of this country.

The defect in the administration of the laws which are upon the statute books arises not out of the fact that the laws are defective, but because we have not had the courage to enforce them. An enforcement of that kind, if it can be had or is to be had, while the other legislation should undoubtedly go on, will have a more tremendous effect on this country than any legislation which we can enact.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator from Iowa in just a moment.

In response to what has been said by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. Borahl], I wish to say that I have no desire to give immunity to any man who has been guilty, if it be proven that he is guilty, of the charges that are alleged in this case. I do not believe that it is necessary in making this investigation to give immunity to anybody. But we do know that whenever these things occur the cry always goes up, "Do not investigate, for fear that you will give immunity." These things, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cummins] said a while ago, have been done in a great many other cases. I do not remember about that, but it does not seem to me they were as flagrant as this is; and we have not found anybody behind the bars yet, immunity or no immunity.

It strikes me that an examination of the books, an examination of the clerks and the bookkeepers of this institution, will show what the facts are, and that will give sufficient information for a civil suit, for instance, to be brought by the present management of that road against the parties guilty of the robbery, if they are guilty, to recover for the benefit of those stockholders the money that has been unlawfully taken away from them. At the same time it would give us information upon which to legislate. It would give the Attorney General information upon which to prosecute. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The difficulty about the situation is, as I understand it, that there exists no Federal law which, being enforced, will put these gentlemen behind the bars of a jail or a penitentiary

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, Mr. President, then the question of immunity is eliminated.

Mr. BORAH. I do not exactly agree with the Senator as to these acts not being punishable under Federal laws, but certainly if facts quoted from the World be true they are punishable under State laws.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly, Mr. President; and the Attorney General of the United States could give to these men or any other men connected with the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad immunity as against prosecution under the laws of New York or Massachusetts or Connecticut or any other State in which the crimes may have been committed. The solution of the whole problem, as I look at it, is to pass a Federal law that will make it criminal to do the things which are stated in the report of Commissioner Prouty. We will not be able to make those things criminal until we assume jurisdiction of the capitalization of the interstate common carriers of the country.
Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield; but I hope the Senator will not take up too much time.

Mr. McCUMBER. With the Senator's permission, may I ask the Senator from Iowa a question? The Senator from Iowa is a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and before that committee, for three or four years or longer, there have been bills providing for just exactly what the Senator speaks of, to bring all the great lines of railway doing interstate business under complete Government control by compelling them either to reincorporate or become licensed under the General Government, and providing specifically for preventive measures, so that it would be impossible the crimes that are charged here against this railway. Yet we the crimes that are charged here against this railway. Yet we the bills are not correct, possibly they need modification, or something of that kind; but I want to ask the Senator from Iowa why we get no action on them; why no report of any kind has been made upon any of those bills that are sought to bring these railways under the control of Congress?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President—

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not discuss the details of some proposed law on this resolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from North Dakota inquired of some member of the committee-

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to yield for that purpose.
Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Nebraska will allow me to say that when we had under consideration the amendment to the interstate-commerce law in 1910 there were some men on this side of the Chamber who tried very hard to incorporate in that amendment suitable provisions relating to this subject. I will not harrow up the feelings of any of the Members of the Senate who may still linger here who were here then, but the Senator from North Dakota will have no difficulty in refreshing his own recollection and assigning the responsibility of the failure to incorporate such provisions in our law upon the persons who ought to bear that responsibility. I say that I have been trying to do it ever since I came into the Senate.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President—
Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is the trouble with the Department of Justice. Although I have had no communication with that office at all, I fear that it has been unable to find in any law of the United States an instrument for the punishment of the wrongdoing that has been disclosed in the investigation carried on with regard to the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska

yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NORRIS. I prefer not to yield for that discussion. I ask other Senators not to inject it here. I do not care to discuss, on this resolution, the details of the law that we ought to pass. I prefer that the Senator will not interrupt me with a view of bringing on that discussion. He knows it would mean endless delay.

Mr. President, only a word in reply to what the two Senators have said. Some of us in the House, where I was at the time the bill referred to was passed, tried to put into the law that kind of a provision. We failed; and if this resolution, through the discussion that it brings forth, will fail to do anything else except to bring about the enactment of that kind of a law, I believe I will have been amply repaid and justified for the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. President, when I was interrupted I was attempting to read an editorial from the New York World—a direct charge—one that Senators will observe is an actionable statement if it is not true, published in their editorial column. I will only read a part of the editorial:

Needless to say this money did not vanish "into thin air." It vanished into the coffers of J. P. Morgan & Co. It was taken out of the treasury of the New Haven by Mr. Morgan and his associates to recompense J. P. Morgan & Co. for loans they had made practically without security to a dummy corporation organized to conceal various financial manipulations in connection with the construction of the Westchester road. Even the exposure of life insurance corruption revealed no more cold-blooded piece of Wall Street piracy than the transaction whose scaly history is printed elsewhere in to-day's issue of the World.

Mr. President, there is something else, in connection with some other investigations, that has a direct bearing on this matter, to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate. stand some investigation has been made in regard to these matters in Boston or elsewhere in Massachusetts by the proper officials there, and that it was there shown that one Henry D. Knowles, of Gloucester, a former representative, testified that he received from the railroad company—that is this railroad company-payment for interviews and for train service investigations while a member of the legislative committee in the summer of 1912 investigating transportation problems in the western part of the State.

Howard L. Ralph, a local manager for the American Press Association, said that articles on the New Haven road furnished by the railroad's publicity department were sent on stereotyped plates to 315 papers in New England by his company without expense to the papers. The railroad company paid the American Press Association a certain fixed rate per line for handling the matter.

It might be well, in that connection, to observe that there is a provision in the Post Office appropriation bill of August 24, 1912, which reads as follows:

That all editorial or other reading matter published in any such newspaper, magazine, or periodical for the publication of which money or other valuable consideration is paid, accepted, or promised shall be plainly marked "advertisement." Any editor or publisher printing editorial or other reading matter for which compensation is paid, accepted, or promised without so marking the same, shall upon conviction in any court having jurisdiction, be fined not less than $50 nor more than $500.

That is the United States statute. I have only read one illustration, but there are a great many others. In this investigation it developed, Mr. President, that there was a professor of law, I believe in Harvard University, who during these years, or at least during a part of them, was getting a salary from this company, I believe at the rate of $10,000 a year, as a kind of advisory attorney. The public knew nothing about it. He delivered lectures; he carried on his work in the university, and I was told this morning by a Member of the House of Representatives that this university professor, before it was disclosed by the investigation that he was a salaried official of this road, had on three different occasions come to Washington, had gone to the office of a member of one of the leading standing committees of the House of Representatives, and that he had on those three different occasions labored with the Representative at length to convince him that there ought to be nothing done in regard to the New Haven Railroad transactions, and that he was so insistent in coming to that Representative's office about the matter that the Representative told him he could not spend any more time with him; that it was useless to try to persuade him to believe along the lines the professor was evidently trying to mark out. These things show what became of some of the funds of the New Haven road, and I have only given you few as illustrations.

Mr. President, I understand that this investigation in Massachusetts showed that there was one item carried on the books of this company known as "Other expenses." The public knew nothing about it, and an ordinary examination would not develop what "Other expenses" meant; but that investigation has shown that these "Other expenses" covered a multitude of transactions that were at least of such a nature that they required explanation. For instance, here are some of them under that head:

10 luncheons__ 10 luncheons__ 10 luncheons__

The price going up. That was after the passage of the tariff bill, I suppose. [Laughter.]

10 luncheons I suppose that was after the passage of the currency bill.

I have been told that 40,000 stockholders of this road are widows and estates belonging to orphans and fatherless children in New

Mr. LIPPITT. Is not the Senator from Nebraska a little in error about the number of the stockholders?

Mr. NORRIS. I may be, but I have so heard. Mr. LIPPITT. My recollection is—it is not important—that the number is 22,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Twenty-two thousand. It is only a question of degree, Mr. President; and they ought to be protected if we

This resolution has been criticized because I recite therein that one object to be attained is-

Whether the person or persons authorizing such investment of the funds of said company and the person or persons receiving the benefit thereof are liable to punishment under existing laws.

It is said that that is asking the Interstate Commerce Commission to advise us, and that that is not its proper function. I will admit that is not the proper function of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and if that were the construction, and the only construction that could be put upon it, I would admit that the resolution was erroneous and wrong in that respect; but my intention in drafting the resolution was to give the Inter-state Commerce Commission an idea of why the Senate wanted the investigation. If you employed some one to investigate a subject for you, and you would tell him in advance what you wanted to know, and especially if he were a lawyer, as are the members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, it would assist him a great deal in carrying out that investigation. I had no thought that the Interstate Commerce Commission was going to advise the Senate in direct terms as to whether these people were liable to punishment; but if they knew why we wanted the information, I thought it certainly would assist them in the character and the nature of the investigation which they would

The third clause of the resolution reads as follows:

Third. Whether under existing law such funds so invested can be recovered on behalf of the stockholders of said company.

That has been criticized for the same reason, that we ought not to ask the Interstate Commerce Commission to tell us that; but, if you will read the resolution, you will find that it does not ask the commission to tell us that, but it directs them to reopen this investigation, to go further into this matter with a view of ascertaining the facts. The reason this language was put into the resolution, or at least that was my idea, was to give the commission to understand that we wanted to know, if it were possible to ascertain, whether under existing law this money could be recovered, so that whoever would be entitled to get the benefit of the facts developed would be enabled to use them in an action to recover.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, when this resolution came up for consideration the other day I asked that it lie over until to-day, with a view to consulting the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate as to whether they desired to insist on a motion for the reference of the resolution to the committee. I consulted the committee this morning, and I find no disposition upon the part of the committee to urge a reference to it of this resolution, and therefore the matter comes up for consideration by the Senate.

I will further state that, immediately after this matter was brought to my attention, I addressed a telephonic communication to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, asking him to transmit to me any information in the possession of the commission that would enable the Senate to act intelligently upon the resolution, particularly with reference to the status of the investigation, and as to whether any further investigation would be desirable or practicable. I will ask the Secretary to read the communication which I have received from the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

My Dear Senato, Washington.

My Dear Senato, Washington.

My Dear Senato, Washington.

My Dear Senator Responsive to your suggestion in our phone conversation the other day, I took up with Mr. Prouty questions presented in Senate resolution No. 260 (introduced by Senator Norms).

I thought, as I presume you thought, that possibly, having personally had charge of our investigation of the New Haven affairs and having prepared the report of the commission, he would have a more intimate knowledge and fresher recollection as to the situation than I had.

I attach copy of my informal memorandum to Mr. Prouty and his memorandum to me in reply. The views expressed by Mr. Prouty are in accord with my understanding and recollection of the situation.

The time since you spoke to me about this has been so short and other matters have so imperatively pressed for attention that it has not been possible to get this in more formal shape for you and get it to you as requested to-day. I trust, therefore, that any appearance of informality will be excused.

Yours, truly,

E. E. Clark, Chairman.

E. E. CLARK, Chairman.

[Memorandum of Mr. Prouty.]

FEBRUARY 5, 1914.

I attach copy of Senate resolution 260, proposing that the commission be instructed to reopen the examination of the affairs of the New Haven road.

-. Chairman.

[Memorandum to the chairman.]

FEBRUARY 5.

Replying to your memorandum of February 5, in reference to Norrisresolution, the investigation of the commission covered only the period during which Mr. Mellen had been president of the company—that is, approximately 10 years—but I am very sure that there is nothing in the New Haven management before that time which would justify an examination.

Our accountants brought away a great mass of figures, which were not incorporated into our report nor even alluded to. My impression is that we have everything in our files which a further examination could disclose. It would be possible to make up from these figures a detailed statement showing the persons to whom this money has been paid, but that, in my opinion, would have but little interest for the public and be of no profit.

In our investigation we traced these transactions as far as could be done from an examination of the books of the New Haven Co. In all cases we ran up against some corporation which was not subject to the jurisdiction of the commission and at whose books we had no authorly to look. No attempt was made to examine the books of these various construction companies, etc., for the reason that this was not germane to the investigation under way. It is possible that something further might be done in this direction, although I somewhat doubt the authority of the commission to reach these companies.

The same remark applies to paragraphs 2 and 3 of the resolution,
These are both matters without the jurisdiction of the commission.

On the whole, I do not believe anything would be accomplished by a further investigation on our part. The Senate itself, with its greater authority in these respects, could undoubtedly accomplish much more than the commission.

Very truly, yours,

(Inclosure.)

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. KENYON. I do not ask the Senator to yield; I was trying to get the floor in my own right.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the question before the Senate is, first, as to whether, in view of the letter of the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the memorandum of Mr. Prouty, it desires further investigation by that commission; and, second, whether it wishes the legal advice of that commission as to whether the persons authorizing these investments are liable to criminal prosecution; and, third, the legal opinion of the commission as to whether the funds so invested can be recovered for the benefit of the stockholders.

It is perfectly clear that any investigation of the subject matter covered by this resolution would come within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission so far as it relates to the rates charged by this corporation. Under the law the Interstate Commerce Commission exercises the function of fixing rates, and in fixing those rates it must have regard to the valuation of the roads, their capitalization, and other factors declared in the decision of the Supreme Court.

Capitalization, therefore, becomes an essential factor in rate regulation. Excessive or fraudulent capitalization would, of course, receive the proper consideration of the commission in regulating rates.

The fourth provision also comes within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, for it asks the recommendation of the commission regarding legislation that will prevent similar transactions in the future. One of the most important functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the law creating it is to make recommendations to Congress; and it may be said with accuracy and truth that almost all the legislation in the way of reform that has been passed amendatory of the interstate-commerce act has been passed pursuant to the persistent recommendation of that commission, which has had and now has the entire confidence of the country.

So far as the legal opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission is concerned regarding criminal prosecutions and the possibility of recovering these funds for the benefit of the stockholders, it is very evident that that inquiry should be made of the Attorney General rather than of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

So far as the Interstate Commerce Commission is concerned, we have the statement that it does not think any further investigation by it will be fruitful of results. The Senate, therefore, is called upon to act upon the question whether it will insist upon further investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, when we know that the Interstate Commerce Commission is already very heavily loaded. We know that it is burdened with work. We know that it has already made an investigation. We know that that investigation has been a very full and complete one, as full and complete as it ought to be made, according to the judgment of the commission; and the question now is whether we shall further press this matter upon the commission itself.

There is another question, also, with reference to the Attorney General's office.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. For information, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce a question in connection with the very point he is now making. It is a question which has been in my mind since the discussion of this amendment began.

I understand that the Interstate Commerce Commission is a body created by law; that its powers are prescribed and defined in the act or acts of its creation; and that it has no powers outside of those conferred upon it by the Congress of the United States. That is a correct statement, is it not?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think it is. Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator to say that the second proposition here, requesting the commission to inquire and ascertain "whether the person or persons authorizing such investment of the funds of said company and the person or persons receiving the benefit thereof are liable to punishment under existing laws," is not a matter coming within the power conferred by law upon the Interstate Commerce Commission. I understand him also to say that the inquiry proposed in the third subsection, to wit, "whether under existing law such funds so invested can be recovered on behalf of the stockholders of said company," is a matter not within the power of the commission under existing law. Do I correctly understand the Senator with reference to those two propositions?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I think that statement is correct. Interstate Commerce Commission has full powers of investigation with reference to rates and with reference to any violations of the interstate-commerce act. I do not recall-perhaps the Senator from Nebraska may recall—that the interstate-commerce act contains any provision regarding the misappropriation or malinvestment of funds. It has provisions relating to rebates, preferences, and things of that kind; and, of course, it would be the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to inquire into any offense against the law in that particular and to turn over the facts to the Attorney General's office with a view to prosecution if the facts justified a prosecution. I will state, further, that I think the same thing is true as to the recovery of funds by a railroad company on behalf of its stock-holders. I know of no provision in the interstate-commerce act regarding that. My view is that if there is any national law at all upon the subject of the misappropriation or mallnyestment of funds, the matter would go to the Attorney General's office for investigation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly. Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator from Nevada, and particularly to the Senator from North Carolina, who propounded the query, that I do not claim that the Inter-state Commerce Commission have the power that he seems to think I thought they had by what I have said in the second and third provisions of the resolution. As I said while I was occupying the floor, the idea of putting that in was simply to let the Interstate Commerce Commission know why the Senate wanted the information. I am not anticipating that if, when they investigated it, they came to a conclusion one way or the other as to those two propositions, they would have in answer to the resolution to tell the Senate what their conclusion was. It is simply giving them our idea as to why we want the information, so as to guide them in making the investigation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, as I read the resolution, it requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to make the investigation with a view to ascertaining four different things; and the matters to which I have called the attention of the Senator from Nevada are two of the four things.

As I understand, the Interstate Commerce Commission is a body of limited powers. It can exercise no jurisdiction and no functions that are not conferred upon it by the law of the land. If the Interstate Commerce Commission is making an investigation for the purpose of enabling it to carry out any of the powers and duties and functions conferred upon it by law, it has authority of law to make that investigation, authority to send for persons and papers, and authority to spend the money of the United States for the purpose of making that investigation.

The question I wish to propound to the Senator from Nevada is this: If we authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an investigation which it has no authority under the law to make, and stop right there, has the commission any power or right or authority to spend the money of the people of the United States in making that extrajudicial investigation, and has it the power to send for persons and papers and to ad-If we are going to confer upon the commission minister oaths? new power to make an investigation by virtue of a joint resoluthat is a different thing. If we are going to do that, we will have to do it in such a way that the authority becomes the law of the land, and is passed by both Houses of Congress and is signed by the President. If we shall undertake to do it, and confer upon the commission the right or impose upon them the duty of making an investigation without authority of law, then, unless at the same time, in some way or other, we give them the money to make the investigation and confer upon them the power to summon witnesses and examine them under oath, they will not have that power.

I ask the Senator if that is not a correct statement of the law, and if, under that statement of the law, it will not be impossible for the Interstate Commerce Commission to exercsie all the powers that are attempted to be conferred upon them under this resolution? As I understand, this is a resolution of the Senate. It is not a joint resolution, which would require the concurrence of the House and the signature of the President, The question I have in my mind is whether, by a resolution of the Senate, we can confer upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to make an investigation which the law does not empower them to make, and whether, if we attempt to do that, they would have the power to spend the money of the people and to perform the other functions that are absolutely necessary in order to conduct these judicial investigations, to wit, summoning witnesses and administering oaths?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Replying to the Senator from North Carolina, I have to say that I have no doubt at all that the Interstate Commerce Commission can assume jurisdiction of the first and fourth clauses of this resolution, the first making an inquiry as to investment at fictitious values, which involves the question of capitalization-a subject that can be justly considered in the regulation of rates-and the fourth what legislation, if any, is necessary to prevent the recurrence of similar transactions. I have no doubt that the commission has jurisdiction over that subject, because it has the power of recommendation to Congress.

As to the intermediate sections, however, the second and third, which call for the opinion of the commission as to whether the person or persons authorizing these investments are liable to punishment under existing laws, and as to whether such funds can be recovered on behalf of the stockholders of the company, I submit that the matter belongs to the jurisdiction of the Attorney General's office, and that the query should be addressed to that office. Such a query would probably involve no expenditure by the Interstate Commerce Commission, for it simply asks for their legal opinion upon facts which they have ascertained in the course of their investigation, which investigation is entirely legal, as it relates entirely to fictitious investments and to excessive capitalization.

So, if the resolution is passed, it seems to me the first and the last clauses ought to be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the second and the third to the Attorney General's office.

Mr. President, the Senator has urged that this investigation should be pressed immediately, although both the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Attorney General's office are now crowded with work with reference to this and accompanying questions. I do not care to emphasize opposition upon that ground, but I wish to present the considerations so that the Senate may have them before it.

We know that the Interstate Commerce Commission is already engaged in a very important inquiry with reference to rate increases. In that inquiry, undoubtedly, the overcapitali-zation of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad is a legitimate subject for investigation; but whether we should insist upon further investigation and report, when the commission has already declared in the communication of Mr. Prouty that, in its judgment, no good can be accomplished, is a question that demands deliberation and consideration.

I understand, of course, the importance of pressing the criminal prosecution of the men who have been guilty of these malinvestments, assuming that they are fully established, but whether or not that is a matter of the first importance in the public interest remains to be considered. The Attorney General's office is now engaged in consultation with Mr. Howard Elliott, the new president of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, with reference to bringing that corporation into harmony with the Sherman Act. That involves not only very serious questions of law, which must be very engrossing, but also very serious questions of finance; and the public itself is immensely interested in the financial reorganization of this road in harmony with the law, so that it can establish the credit necessary for it to carry out its rehabilitation.

In the judgment of many the present financial condition of this road is largely responsible for the numerous accidents upon it involving destruction of life and property. The whole transportation system of New England depends upon the proper reorganization and the proper running of this great system. It seems to me it might well be left to the discretion of the Attorney General-an official in whom we all have confidencedetermine whether he shall rush to the front first the practical question, in the interest of the public, of the immediate reorganization and rehabilitation of this road, or whether he shall be diverted from that needed work into a criminal prosecution.

Of course, if there is danger of the statute of limitations intervening, I can understand that it will be absolutely essential to press these prosecutions immediately. On that subject I am not informed.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator has suggested the statute of limitations. That has been running through my mind. I understand that the occurrences to which the Senator from Nebraska has referred took place in 1907 or 1908. Has the Senator from Nevada given any attention to the question whether the statute of limitations has run or whether this is in the nature of a continuing crime?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; I have given no consideration to it, and I am not informed in regard to it. As I understand, there are no national laws upon the subject, so that the prosecution would have to be pushed under State laws, and that would be no part of the duty of the Attorney General.

Mr. KENYON. The Sherman antitrust law might possibly reach the officers

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Sherman antitrust law might reach them; but so far as the matter of excessive capitalization is concerned. I imagine that if that is an offense at all under existing law it is an offense under State law.

Mr. NORRIS. That being true, there would not be any danger of any immunity from an investigation under this resolution?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; there would be none whatever.

Now, Mr. President—
The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 7951) to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, think that this resolution ought to be divided into two parts, referring the first and fourth division to the Interstate merce Commission and the second and third to the Attorney General. But the fact remains that there is no national law under which overcapitalization can be punished. We have been trying to pass such a law for many years. The matter came up in 1910 under legislation proposed in Mr. Taft's administration. The clause provided for the control by the National Government of stock and bond issues.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HUGHES in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. LODGE. Has the unfinished business been laid before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business has been laid before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that the Senator from Nevada is discussing the resolution of inquiry.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will state that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] told me that he would have no objection to my concluding my remarks.

Mr. LODGE. If the resolution has gone over-

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The resolution has gone over. Mr. LODGE. That is all right. It is not going to be acted upon to-day. I understand that the resolution went over without prejudice. Is not that the understanding of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I am told at the desk that it has been sent to the calendar. Some of us want to dispose of the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may go over without prejudice, without going to the calendar.
Mr. LODGE. Certainly; that was the understanding.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska

asks manimous consent that the resolution may go over without prejudice. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand from the Senator from Georgia that he is desirous of proceeding with the unfinished business, and I will defer further remarks until to-morrow.

COOPERATIVE AGRICULTURAL EXTENSION WORK.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7951) to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work between the agricultural colleges in the several States receiving the benefits of an act of Congress approved July 2, 1862, and of acts supplementary thereto, and the United States Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, some days ago I submitted some remarks upon the pending bill. I am not going to consume the further time of the Senate. I took the position at that time that this appropriation, if made, would not benefit the farmer to anything like the extent that is claimed for it, and that practically to a great extent it would be simply a waste of the public money.

What the farmer needs, in my judgment, is not teaching that will enable him to grow larger crops, but the ability to dispose of the crops he raises. Bearing upon that question I submit an article that is from Up-to-Date Farming, a journal published in Indianapolis, and I ask that it may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From Up-to-Date Farming, Indianapolis, Feb. 1, 1914.] REAL CONDITIONS AND ACTUAL NEEDS—THE FACTS HAVE BEEN FORCED TO THE TOP.

What we are going to print below is nothing new to readers of Up-to-Date Farming. For many years we have told the public that increased production, however desirable, is no remedy for the "high cost of living"; nor does the prosperity of the farmers or of the country depend upon that. Our argument was that the farmers already produced a surplus, and the greater the surplus the less it was worth to those whose labor produced it, and that it added nothing to the supply for those who needed it. This argument seemed so different from what the world had previously understood that it was ignored in official life, and the schools and the press continued to teach and urge greater production as the one thing for the farmers to learn and to do. Former Secretary Wilson's figures, in spite of the hands through which they passed, showed different, but the idea was so startling and so apparently absurd that the facts were ignored, and agricultural "extension" trains gave forth their supposedly awakening sounds throughout the country, and scheme after scheme, backed by millions of money, was inaugurated to induce heavier yields.

No remedy came. The farmers worked, crops grew, surpluses were marketed, and valuable products went to waste or were destroyed. Over the wasting piles of what the farmers could not sell they had to accept meager prices for what was taken, and the consumers were compelled to pay exorbitant prices for what they used. We kept up our light. The people read and wondered and by and by believed. But not so the press and the schools; and not so the politicians who were seeking place and power. They feared the ruling forces, and dared not condemn what seemed to be popular in high places nor to admit facts that powerful influences did not desire should be made known.

But ours is a Government of the people, and truths that affect all can not always be hidden. If persistently, faithfully, and honestly brought out, they will be seen. The light will shine in spite of the clouds that may for a time roll between us made their way to Washington. As a vindication, we are glad to quote from Secretary Houston. Our readers must realize that it is very similar to quoting editorials that appeared in this paper years ago, and that makes us all the more ready to quote them now. In his recent report Secretary Houston said:

"However desirable increased production on farms may appear to be from the consumer's standpoint, it does not follow that such increased production would result in any increase in the cash income per farm or per capita of farm population, or that prices paid by consumers would be any lower.

"Had the total production in 1913 equaled or exceeded the 1912 production, it seems probable that the cash income per farm would not have been greater and might have been less than in 1912, but it is extremely doubtful whether the cost to the consumer would have been any less, because retail prices are promptly raised on a prospect of underproduction, but are very slow to decline if there is overproduction.

"The long line of distributors and middlemen between the farmer and the consumer are in a position to take advantage of the market and to a certain extent control the market in both directions, because they are better organized to keep informed of crop and market conditions and to act promptly than either farmers or consumers, who are not organized and as individuals are helpless.

"The high prices paid by consumers, ranging from 5 to nearly 50 per cent in some cases more than the farmer receives, indicate that there is plenty of room for lowering the cost of farm products to consumers and at the same time largely increasing the cash income per farm without increasing farm production.

"This condition is undoubtedly a marketing problem which will have to be solved by better organization of farmers and improved methods of marketing.

"When, as the result of such organization and improved methods, the price of farm products can be maintained at a higher level without increasing the cost to consumers, farmers will be justif middlemen."

Farmers, will you believe it now? Will you heed what Secretary Houston, at the head of the farm department of the Government, says? "This condition is undoubtedly a marketing problem which will have to be solved by better organization of farmers and improved methods of marketing."

Lawmakers, will you heed the warning? Whom serve ye, the managers of the market, the speculators in farm products, because of the power they are supposed to have at the polls, or the people who really cast the ballots?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am very glad to know that the Senator from California [Mr. Works] has presented this matter to the Senate for the information not only of the Senate, but for the information of the people of this great country. It practically coincides with what I have formerly said on this floor-that the success of the farmer depends not only upon the amount that he produces, but it depends upon his income; it depends upon whether he receives such a price for his product as to make the industry of farming a profitable one.

There is no other business that I know of, nor is there any other industry in which people are engaged, where those who are engaged in the industry must depend upon other people's judgment as charity, if I might say so, to place upon those products a certain price. The farmer has nothing to say about fixing the price of his product. The price is always fixed by men who are not engaged in the industry, but who are engaged in handling the product after it leaves the farm.

Overproduction in grain, in cattle, in cotton, or in any product produced on the farm means a lower price of that product. I do not mean by that that we should discourage the farmer from taking an active interest in scientific agriculture and in being able to produce more bushels to a given area, but, as I have so often said on this floor and elsewhere, until we make it possible for the farmer to get a price for his product that will give him at least a small profit we are not going to make farming a success and we are not going to get people to go back to the farm.

When the representatives of railroads of this country come before Congress or before the Interstate Commerce Commission making complaint that they are not making a profit in their industry, out of a sense of justice we increase their rates. When the manufacturer engaged in the industry of manufacturing shows that his business is unprofitable he is generally protected or he is given the opportunity of making a profit on the goods he manufactures. It is not so with the farmer. The farmer has to take the price that is placed upon his product by some one engaged in handling his products after they leave the farm.

Mr. President, I believe that if we could expend the same amount of money to teach the farmer how to market his crops.

to make it possible for the farmers to combine and to dispose of their products at a lower cost for transportation and marketing, it would be more beneficial to the American farmer than the

For years and years the American farmer has produced more grain than the American trade could take care of. It is seldom that he has produced less than the amount required for our country. The American farmer has for the last 50 years, I believe, produced a surplus in his own country and has exported products amounting to millions, yes, hundreds of millions of dollars, giving a balance of trade in favor of the United States.

I do not think that it is the fault of the American farmer that the balance of trade has at times been against us. I believe that they have seen the advantage and taken advantage of new methods of scientific farming. They have not neglected their industry. While I find no fault with the idea of the Federal Government appropriating money for the agricultural colleges of the various States in the interest of this work, it can not be said that this is a new idea or a new theory or that it is unknown to the American farmer, because it is not.

I sympathize with the people who are living in States where conditions are such that a certain class need more instruction in farming, and I have no objection to making appropriations that will benefit those sections. But after all, Mr. President, this bill makes appropriations which will amount to millions of dollars, and which will be expended by certain men not engaged in the industry of farming but by certain men not engaged in the industry of farming but by certain educators who are to teach the practical farmer how to farm. I shall be surprised if much of this vast amount of money is not only wasted but deliberately used for political purposes. I know something about what is going on in my own State. I could refer back to what has happened within the last two weeks and them that the melowest of the Companyon. show that men who are in the employment of the Government are participating in conventions and nominating candidates for

Mr. President, the American farmers are not as foolish as some people believe them to be. While they are slow to make complaint, I want to remind Senators that when they have fully made up their minds and satisfied themselves that legislation is being enacted not for the purpose of helping the farmer but for the purpose of making it appear that it is beneficial to him, no legislation of that sort is going to be welcomed.

Mr. President, I believe in making appropriations by the Federal Government and by the States for the purpose of disseminating knowledge among all classes of people, among farmers as well as manufacturers.

I wish to say that the editorial just read at the desk bears out the statement that I made. It is an editorial written by a man who I believe has the interest of the farmer at heart. He quotes in that editorial a statement made by our great Secretary of Agriculture. I agree with Mr. Houston in the statement he makes, that while we are anxious to increase production we should be just as anxious to see that when the farmer makes his crop it is made at as little cost as it is possible for it to be made; that through transportation and the system of marketing it is made possible for him to get at least what his products cost him to produce.

This can not be done and will not be done by any provisions contained in the pending bill. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], for whom I have not only personally a great deal of respect but admiration for his splendid ability and for the great work he has done in the interest of the farmer, presented to this body a bill which, in my judgment, would be far more beneficial to the farmer than this bill can possibly be.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him just a moment?

Mr. GRONNA. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Department of Agriculture is now engaged in developing the division of markets, which the Senator from North Dakota and I supported on the floor of the Senate and which originated here. The colleges of agriculture are studying market problems now right behind the Department of Agriculture. It is my earnest belief that the men from the colleges in this extension work will cooperate with the farmers and do for them as much service in the line of utilizing the suggestions that come from the Department of Agriculture and the information gathered about marketing their crops as with reference to increasing them. regarded that as one of the most important services that these men would perform.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am very glad to have that assurance from my friend, the Senator from Georgia, but it is of those who constitute the body which develops the cononly a week or 10 days ago since a certain convention was held crete force; in other words, in the association of government, out in the northwestern country, where members of a certain chamber of commerce were the dominant factors in shaping resolutions, and the president of an agricultural college was the chairman. That convention was known as the Tristate Grain Convention, consisting of membership from three States, and I say men representing the International Harvester Works and men representing great railroads were the leading spirits dominating that convention, and the farmers were very They were not heard to the extent, if they were heard at all at these meetings, as were men representing these great gigantic trusts.

I hope, Mr. President, that the provisions of this bill will be carried out in the spirit in which they are intended, for the diffusion of knowledge, for disseminating knowledge among farmers, teaching them how to more economically and abundantly grow crops. I have no doubt-in fact, I know-that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], as well as other Senators, believes that this legislation is in the interest of the farmer. hope it is; I hope it will be beneficial to the farmer, because if there is any industry in the country that needs support it is the industry of farming. It is perfectly evident, from the very fact that strong, virile men, young boys who have grown up on the farm, are loath to remain on the farm and that they go to The very reason for that, in my opinion, is that farming is not a profitable industry; but when you make that industry more profitable, when you can show to the farmer that he can get a bigger income, that he can get more pay for his products, no matter where the farm is located, whether in North or in the South, in the East or in the West, there will be no difficulty in keeping men on the farm.

The farmer, not only accepts the price placed upon his products by other people, but his industry is such that his paper is undesirable. He pays a higher rate of interest than any other class of men engaged in any other industry. When men in other business secure capital at the rate of from 31 to 41 per cent, the farmer pays the maximum, no matter what the prevailing rate of interest may be. He pays a higher price for his labor than any other men engaged in any other industry. He works longer hours. He, with himself and family, puts in more hours of hard labor than anyone engaged in any other industry and at a lower wage per day, as has been so well shown by my colleague [Mr. McCumber].

But, it is said, we are going to take care of the farmer now and furnish him cheaper capital. Mr. President, no doubt such bills introduced in the Senate and in the other House have been introduced with good intentions. It is perhaps believed by those who are sponsors for those bills that they will possibly furnish the farmer with money at a lower rate, but I have looked those bills over carefully, and my mind is entirely too obtuse to see where the farmer is going to get his capital.

If you are going to benefit the farmer with cheaper money, why do you not pass some law authorizing the President of the United States to issue long-time bonds at a low rate of interest to be loaned on farms? It is possible for the Government of the United States to loan its credit to the farmers of this country as well as it does to the bankers of the country. There is a possibility of the farmer getting cheaper money, providing we are willing to say that Government bonds shall be sold for the sole purpose of loaning the money to the farmer on long time and at a rate of interest slightly in advance of the rate paid by the Government.

Suppose the Government should issue a billion dollars' worth of bonds at the rate of 3 per cent, to be loaned to the farmers at the rate of 4 per cent. In 47 years the farmer would pay not only the interest, but he would wipe out the entire debt. I want to suggest that plan to the majority party.

We all want the farmer to produce as much to a given area as possible, but we need not think that the farmer is going to continue to pile up a surplus of products and sell them at a loss from year to year. Unless the farmer can get a profit on his products, unless he can be given a market where he can dispose of his products at a price that is profitable, the people of this country are not going to flock back to the farm.

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended to say. simply rose to say that I agree with all that is said in the article presented by the Senator from California [Mr. Works], and I agree with every word which the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Houston, has said in his report on this phase of the industry of agriculture, Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, I think we all recognize that there is a force born of the union of purpose and activity far in excess of what the aggregate of the individual force would moral and material benefit may properly be considered as one of the objects sought in the association. That being true, it, no doubt, is within the fair purview of the purpose of free government that the force thus developed may be used along certain lines to develop certain conditions; but it is a line of policy that is always fraught with a great deal of danger, because the moment the government is invoked either in affirmative legislation, in negative legislation, or in direct appropriation of funds, there is a danger that the particular class in whose interest such government force is invoked may press the vantage ground which they have, by reason of political superiority, in the policies of the government.

Every suggestion for the employment of government as an adjunct to the material development of a people should be considered with the most careful reference to the question of how broad the benefit sought to be attained is extended, because, of course, we all recognize that, in the complex condition of our civilization, no class of our people can be benefited without reflecting that benefit more or less upon all others, and no class can be injured by governmental policies without visiting that injury more or less upon all other classes. Taking that broad view, however, and exercising the utmost care, there is still always the danger that the force of government thus invoked may be unjustly and unfairly applied.

Agriculture stands out peculiar in its appeal to governmental aid in this respect. First, we are all theoretically interested in extending to the broadest possible scope the productiveness of our soil. Whether the consumer gets his share of the increased benefits of that production and whether the producer gets his share are incidental questions which, of course, must be dealt with by themselves, but theoretically our entire people are interested in developing the agricultural resources of our country. It has even a broader appeal than that, because of all the forces that face our civilization as a menace there is none to-day that stands out at such an acute angle as the tendency of our people to crowd into the cities.

The great city is the place where vice feeds upon itself, like a great festering sore thriving upon its own rottenness. The best interests of our Republic demand the widest possible extension of our population outside of the cities. So that, without reference to its direct benefit to the farmer, any legislative policy which will tend to check the tendency of our people to herd in the cities and which will tend to keep upon the farm those who are there and encourage others to go upon the farm has the widest possible foundation for its justification.

Under this view of this question, while I think there are some provisions in this bill which I wish were not here, while I feel, perhaps, that some of this money will be wasted, still, for one, I think I can find a justification for the appropriation here contemplated.

But, Mr. President, there is one phase of this matter which has come out prominently in the discussion of the last day or two. It seems that when this bill was first drawn it provided:

That in any State in which two or more such colleges-

Being the colleges referred to in the bill-have been or hereafter may be established the appropriations hereinafter made to such State shall be administered by such college or colleges as the legislature of such State may approve, upon a plan to be submitted to the Secretary of the Interior.

The latter part of the provision I am quoting from memory, but I think I am within the facts in saying that the bill as first prepared referred the matter at least to the consideration of the Secretary of the Interior.

That same provision has been in former laws, and the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] yesterday said that in those laws where that provision is found there had been at least some approximation to a fair division of the appropriations between the white and colored races in the States to which that provision had reference, while in those laws where no such provision was contained the money had gone practically entirely to the white race. I can not bring myself to justify the elimination from this bill of the provision upon that subject found in the laws referred to by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose this afternoon to discuss at any length the racial question. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has very frankly admitted that under the provisions of this bill as those provisions now stand the appropriation will be administered entirely through the white college in his State.

Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] stated yesterday what, of course, every student of divine law and human experience knows, that the South suffered far more from the curse of slavery than the enslaved race itself suffered. That has always been the law; it has always been the experience. oppressed suffer less than the oppressor; the one upon whom a wrong is visited, in the last analysis, suffers less than the one who visits the wrong upon him. Whatever source we may ascribe to that law, whatever the condition under which that law is invoked, human experience confirms the existence of such

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Walsh in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I hope the Senator in the discussion of this question will not lose sight of the fact that slavery was not originally a southern institution as distinguished from other parts of the Republic. The South was no more responsible for it than was the North. As a matter of fact, the slave trade had its headquarters in the little State of Rhode Island, and there was never a dime's worth of stock owned in a slave ship by a southern man. While the system worked wrong, though not in the sense in which the Senator has expressed himself, the South was in no way more responsible for it than were the people of the North. The slave was brought here and sold to the southern man by the northern man, and the northern man made money. The southern man bought the slave, raised cotton with the negro, and made money. So far as the moral responsibility is concerned, one section is just as much responsible for it as the other; but great pecuniary loss fell upon the South when the North liberated the slaves.

Mr. CLAPP. It was not the pecuniary loss I was about to discuss. I am fearful that the Senator from Mississippi is perhaps a little oversensitive as to what I was saying. I regret his interruption, because I had no intention of making any comparison of responsibility. It is true that in the North men were engaged in bringing the slaves to America, and it is equally true, no doubt, that it was the climatic conditions in the North which reconciled the North earlier to the extinction of slavery than in the slave States. I believe in being perfectly frank and fair, and I had intended no distinction that would have reflected any moral obloquy upon the South.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I did not take it in that way. I simply wanted to keep the record straight; that was all.

Mr. CLAPP. Very well. It lessens nothing the force of what I was saying, that the oppressor pays the penalty, for the North, in a large measure, shared in the consequences of slavery and the slave trade; but climatic conditions rendered it perhaps more natural that the system should linger and flourish in the South.

Mr. President, the penalty that the South paid was not alone in blood and in treasure, but the South paid the same penalty that is ever visited upon the oppressor, in the lessened strength, activity, and force of the oppressor, due to the fact that he is not obliged to put forth that effort which he would put forth if he did not depend upon the activities of those who were oppressed and who served him. I believe to-day that the South is suffering from that condition and that cause.

At the close of the great strife, which, in my humble judgment, would never have been witnessed had it not been for slavery, the colored people were found in a peculiar condition. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that in many of the families of the South there was an absolute affection on the part of the master for the slave and an affection on the part of the slave for the master. The best testimony of that is that, so far as my reading goes, during the four years of that struggle, while the slave was probably ever ready to shield and shelter those whom he thought were bringing freedom to him, he seldom-in all my reading I have never yet found an instance-where he betrayed the helplessness of those who had been intrusted to him while his master went forth to the field of battle. That must stand as a monument to the affection which existed between master and slave. This race, numbering then some four millions, were and slave. This race, numbering their some four minions, were found in a practically destitute condition. Under the law they could have no property; they could not enforce any property rights. It is true that many masters gave to their slaves some sort of title to property, very much, I assume, as a farmer may give to his son or his daughter, some particular piece of property upon his farm; but, above and beyond all, was the law which prevented, as I understand and recall it now, as to every State—there may have been exceptions—the right of recovery of property by the slave.

It is no doubt true that in many families, and on the part especially of many Christian mistresses, an effort was made to give some degree of education to some of the slaves; but the fact remains that there were laws against the education of the black man, and that in the main he was without education. their progress since then the Senator from Washington [Mr.

Jones] has already spoken.

There is some force in the position taken by the Senators from those States that, having this problem on their hands, having to deal with this situation, they are better qualified to judge what should be done than those who are not so situated; but, Mr. President, here comes in another great natural law: The master, the oppressor, the superior one has ever arrogated to himself the authority to say what was better for the one who was oppressed, the one who was enslaved, or the one who was dominated by the superior. Had it been left to the say-so of the power which governed, the power which enslaved, and the power which dominated, there would never have been any human progress. The king never has gone down from his throne to take the subject by the hand and place him upon a plane of equality with himself. No feudal baron ever rode forth from his castle giving his keys to the toilers in the valley; but the toilers in the valley, your ancestors and mine, by war and the spirit of free institutions, climbed the hillside and tore down the feudal wall. . So, no matter how generous, how fair the spirit of the master may be in what he seeks to do, history confirms me in the proposition that we would have had no progress in this world if we had left it to the volition of him, who on the throne, at the head of the army, master, or otherwise superior, to say in what manner and when progress should be accorded to those beneath, below, and in subjection. So while it is true that we do not live in the environment of Georgia, we are all capable of measuring, analyzing, and fathoming those human purposes and human forces which ever operate in human activities.

It is said by the Senator from Georgia that it is to the interest of the southern farmer to develop the agricultural efficiency of his tenants. Undoubtedly that is true; but, Mr. President, the southern negro is a citizen of the United States. We in Minnesota are interested in the final solution of the negro question in Georgia. The people of Iowa are interested in the final solution of the negro problem in Louisiana. This entire country is interested in the solution of that problem, because if it can not be pencefully and fairly solved, then in some form-heaven, in its infinite wisdom, only knows how-this entire country must again pay the penalty, because we can not expect to escape it if a wrong is committed.

The man from the North understands human nature, and the negro of the South is a human being. While he may have peculiar propensities, while he may have peculiar mental conditions born of his environment, there is an underlying law of human nature that pervades the purpose and spirit of the negro in the South as absolutely and certainly as that which pervades the negro of the North, and it is this: You have got to hold out to a man some hope, some prospect; there has got to be some inspiration given him to look forward to the time when he will not be a pupil, when he will develop into a spirit of independence. The mere financial interest of the Georgia farmer in the development of the efficiency of his tenant farmer along the lines suggested in this bill will not develop that in-dependence of spirit, that hope of some day standing upon his own footing, which is essential to the final development of the negro and the solution of the negro problem, because in that respect the negro problem is simply a human problem, and the laws of human nature apply to human nature wherever you find it.

Now, why strike out the provision in the former law? To strike out the provision contained in the former bill is to say to every colored man, North and South, "You are being discriminated against in this law. You are made the basis of the appropriation itself; you are counted when it comes to taking the dollars from the Treasury of the Federal Government, but you are to be ignored, even through representation, to say nothing of the detail of representation, when it comes to the division of that appropriation." When we consider that we are invading the somewhat dangerous domain of taking money from the taxpayers of the country and devoting it to one specific purpose along the line of the development and benefit of one particular class it seems to me that as little as we can do in fairness and justice is to insist that somewhere in this scheme of distribution there shall be at least some sort of an appeal to the Federal Government that is bestowing, not its own benefaction, but as trustee for all the people, a benefaction derived from all and distributing it to a few.

For that reason I, for one, am in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington. It does not take this money away from these people. If, as the Senator from Geor-gia yesterday so frankly stated, it appears that it would be a waste of this fund to put it in this college or that, it seems to me it is going a long way, a bow drawn at a long venture, to suggest that a Cabinet officer would thus insist upon the distribution of this fund. All we ask is, in addition to the legislature of the State, which, of course, primarily is in the midst of this environment and primarily considers the environment, that before the action of the legislature becomes final, subject as that legislature may be to local conditions in the State affecting the purpose and the judgment of the legislature, it shall be submitted to a Cabinet officer of this Government.

I, for one, believe it is a dangerous program to enter upon to make appropriations to the States and not somewhere in the appropriation reserve that final authority on the part of the Government, vested in some officer and resting in that officer, to be exercised if in the distribution of the fund by the legislature it is manifest that injustice is being done.

I can not see how those who have so long contended against this policy should now be in favor of it. All we ask, as I said before—and I shall not longer trespass upon the time of the Senate—is that this bill shall simply provide that the matter shall be submitted to a cabinet officer of the Federal Government. Since it is a Federal appropriation, I think we should retain and reserve that much of final authority and power over the appropriation, if by any possibility there is danger of its being misapplied and misappropriated.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, before formally presenting a proposed unanimous-consent agreement, I wish to inquire whether any one present is opposed to it, because if so it will be useless to call a quorum and put the balance of the Senators on notice.

The proposed agreement is as follows:

The proposed agreement is as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that not later than 4 o'clock on February 6 the Senate will proceed to the consideration of House bill 7051, and during that calendar day vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendments that may be offered, and upon the bill through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after 4 o'clock on February 6 no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, nor more than once nor longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do I understand the Senator to ask that vote shall be taken to-day?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That we shall commence voting at 4 o'clock, but leaving all amendments to the bill and the bill itself subject to 10 minutes' debate from that time on.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I never have known a unanimousconsent agreement to be asked on an important measure where it was provided that the vote should be taken on the day the request was made. I hope the Senator will put that off a little longer than to-day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I shall not press the proposed agreement at this time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should not object to it if the time fixed were to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have offered it several times before, and I will wait a little longer. I was rather under the impression that no other Senator desired to speak at length upon the bill; but I shall not offer the proposed agreement now. Mr. GALLINGER. It is possible that the Senator will get a vote on his bill to-day.

I wish to make a few observations on the measure, but, as is my custom, I shall not speak at great length.

It has not been my privilege, because of enforced absence from the city, to hear the debate on this important measure. I favor the principle of the bill and have intended to vote for it, as I probably shall in whatever shape it may assume. have hurriedly, at my desk, sketched the speech of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], made on the bill yesterday. The Senator was, as he always is, frank and unequivocal in the arguments he offered and in the conclusions he reached. I would gladly agree with the Senator from Georgia if I could so far as the distribution of this fund is concerned in a certain portion of the country, but I have not been able to bring myself to that view.

The Senator from Georgia states that there are more colored men in the State of Georgia than in any other State of the American Union, and he puts the number at 1,170,000. According to the census of 1910 the population of the State of Georgia was 2,609,121. So there are 1,170,000 colored men in the State and 1,439,121 whites, or, in other words, there are only between two and three hundred thousand more whites than colored, the colored population being 45 per cent of the whole.

It seems to me the fact that there are almost as may colored people in Georgia as there are whites is a controlling reason why we should in every possible way do what we can to elevate those people and make good citizens of them. If the colored men in Georgia are educated, especially along the lines of industrial education and of agriculture, which the Senator has so ably advocated heretofore, the State of Georgia will be the stronger and the richer and the more powerful because of that I do not know whether I shall speak from the book or not when I call attention to the claims that are made as to the progress of the negro in the South since the days of his emancipation. It may be that the claims that have been made in certain quarters are exaggerated, and that he has not made the advance that has been suggested by certain people who have written on the subject; but the claims have not been disputed, and I am fully persuaded, from what little knowledge I personally possess, that the advance of the negro in the South has been much more rapid than the advance of the white serfs of Russia, and that he deserves a great deal of credit for what he has accomplished under the most adverse conditions. Without at all raising the race question, because I have no disposition at all to do that, I feel that as a representative of one of the States of the Union it is my duty to do everything I can, by voice and by vote, to help along the progress of those people to a higher and a better civilization than they have yet at-

I had not the privilege of hearing the speech of the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] who has introduced the amendment which I favor; and it is barely possible that in what I shall introduce into the Record I may be traversing ground covered by the Senator. His speech has not yet been put into print, and hence I have not had an opportunity of examining it.

I have here a communication from the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, with headquarters in New York. They publish a newspaper called "The Crisis." Connected with that institution I find the names of some very worthy men and women. The national president is Moorfield Storey, of Boston, a man with whom I do not agree on some matters, but a very distinguished citizen of the State of Massachusetts, who stands for a great deal that is good in our national life. At the head of the board of directors stands Miss Jane Addams, of Chicago, a woman who has done so much for the civic betterment of the whites of this country, and who apparently is doing what she can for the civic betterment of the colored people of the country.

This communication, which came to me, and which I presume has come to other Senators. I think ought to go in the RECORD.

It is dated January 28, 1913. They say:

The Smith-Lever bill, now pending in the Senate, will provide appropriations for agricultural extension work to be carried on by the colleges receiving benefits under the acts of 1862 and 1890 in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture.

In each of the Southern States but one there are two such colleges—one for white and one for colored students.

I confess that was a surprise to me when I read it—that the colored people have established in each of the Southern States but one a college for the study of agriculture. It is a splendid record, of which they may well be proud. They continue:

The bill provides that in such cases the appropriations "shall be administered by such college or colleges as the legislature of such State may direct." This provision would authorize the State legislatures to give the administration of the whole fund to the white colleges.

As I understand, the Senator from Georgia frankly stated in his speech that that would be the policy of the Southern States.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly in my State; I think it would be the only intelligent thing to do.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the way I read it in the Senator's

If the bill should be enacted with this clause the colleges for colored students would have the administration of none of the funds, and the colored farmers would receive little if any of the benefits. This statement is not conjecture. It is proved by facts.

Under the act of 1862, which did not safeguard their interests, the colored colleges received $291,285, or 8½ per cent of the total of $3,408,893. Under the act of 1890, which did safeguard their interests, they received, of the income in 1912, $240,478,57, or 28 per cent of the total of $850,000.

The act of March 2, 1887 (34 Stat. L., 431), appropriating money for agricultural experiment stations provided that the appropriations "shall be equally divided between such colleges unless the legislature of such State or Territory shall otherwise direct." As a result of this provision almost nothing from the appropriations went to the colored colleges.

provision almost nothing from the appropriations.

The Jones amendment to the Smith-Lever bill safeguards the interests of the colleges for colored students by substituting for the clause which authorizes the State legislatures to name the colleges which are to administer the funds, a clause modeled on that in the act of 1890. If this amendment is adopted a fair and equitable division will be provided for between the white and colored colleges to be agreed upon between the State legislatures and the Secretary of the Interior.

We earnestly urge you to vote for this amendment, which asks for nothing but bare justice for the colored farmer.

Very truly, yours,

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION FOR THE ADVANCEMENT OF COLORED PEOPLE.

Mr. President, as I said a moment ago-and I am speaking entirely without preparation—I will put into the Record some statements as to the advance of the colored people of the South in their material development, which I assume is true.

however that may be, I think it is universally conceded by those who have studied the question, both North and South, that all things considered, that people freed half a century ago have made wonderful progress in the acquisition of property and in

I have in my hand an article which, if I remember correctly, I clipped from the Congregationalist, a religious paper of one of the leading denominations in the city of Boston. The statements contained in that article are so illuminating and so impressive regarding the people who are to be discriminated against if this bill passes in its present form that I feel I shall be pardoned for reading it to the Senate. It was published not long ago, perhaps a month ago or thereabouts. It is headed, "The changed attitude toward the negro," and is as follows:

The romantic period of the negro's emancipation is over. There was a time when we listened in the North with a throb of heart to the songs of freedom hoped for or attained. The call of the unfinished work spoke to us and we could sing—of freedom noped for or attained. The call of the unfinished work spoke to us and we could sing—

"The good time coming is almost here; It's been long, long, long on the way."

Uncle Tom was a vivid reality to many an imagination, and we felt keen satisfaction in the thought that the slave was to be proclaimed a brother.

That romantic chapter in the history of the negro race in America is long ago closed and can not be reopened. Many of its fruits in philanthropy and legislation have dropped abortive from the bough. We have tried the experiment of giving the ballot for the negro's self-protection, and all over the South it has been filched away from him. We have educated his sons and daughters, and they are now denied any share in the common life. The trades and occupations more and more are closed against him We complain that the strangers who have passed through our entrance gates are clannish and live apart. But we compel these children of our own soil to live apart in servile or in clannish isolation. The last places that were his in public office are being taken away from him or with deliberate intention of contempt certain places in the lower ranks are left to him alone.

There is no glamor now about the cause of the negro in America. The southern white man stops in his motor car before the Shaw monument in Boston in polite and dumb astonishment. The average man is frankly bored by all discussion of the rights and wrongs of the colored man.

What remains for the Christian in America in recard to these men

The southern white man stops in his motor car before the snaw monument in Boston in polite and dumb astonishment. The average man is frankly bored by all discussion of the rights and wrongs of the colored man.

What remains for the Christian in America in regard to these men and women whom God made with a dark skin and were brought to dwell almong us? There are 10,000,000 of them, all theoretical citizens of the United States. Can we afford to be merely bored in thinking of their needs and cares? Two opportunity of aid.

If the romantic age of negro emancipation had gone by and left the negro as he was, there would some excuse for the southern white man's kindly contempt and for the northern white man's bored indifference. But a race that has developed its own strong and cultivated leaders, that has risen from slavery and in a single generation educated more than 60 out of every 100 of its people, old and young, a race that from poverty and dependence has accumulated $700,000,000 worth of property and tills 20,000,000 acres of freehold farms, is a strong race and will yet assert itself powerfully in our national life.

If it does not grow out of the soil of Christian brotherhood, our duty of recognition should grow out of mere admiration for great achievement under conditions harder than we have ever known. Grudging acknowledgment here is an arraignment of our powers of admiration for great and difficult work well done and lofty aims accomplished.

The duty of aid remains. Shall not we brothers of the ministering Christ rather call it a privilege? Help has been given; help must still be given to secure and to advance this hope of the negro-American. If he is to live in a class apart, we must see to it that he has the higher culture as well as the practical opportunity to make that class worthy of our own high ideals.

The relapse of the American negro into barbarism would in a hundred ways be a calamity to our national life. Money and thought are well expended here. And by our capacity for going on in this work

I wish also to read another clipping that I made a little while ago from some publication, and which is very brief. When I speak of the amount of property that these people have accumulated and the ratio of illiteracy in their ranks, I speak, as I suggested a moment ago, without personal knowledge, but I have reason to believe the statements are accurate. The clipping is as follows:

A race that owns property valued at $700,000,000, including 20,000,000 acres of land, and has only 30 per cent of illiterates in a single generation after slavery can not be called decadent. This is the reply of the National Negro Business League to the critics of the negro in America. It calls attention to the fact that this amount exceeds the whole value of the possessions of the white pensants of Russia, The direction in which the faces of these Americans are set is indicated by the reelection by the league of Booker Washington as president for the fourteenth consecutive year.

Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States. If I did, possibly it would excite a feeling of more or less rancor on both sides of the Chamber. The fact is that the negroes were given the right of suffrage. They are not granted that right to-day. I believe the future will take care of that question in some way, and I trust the proper way, but it has no place in this discussion, and I do not propose to discuss it.

I do, however, in all sincerity and earnestness, with simply a feeling of what I conceive to be common justice to the colored people of the country, who are almost in a majority in Georgia, and who are in a majority in the State of South Carolina, numbering ten or more millions of men and women in the country, appeal in their behalf to the Senate of the United States to do them the justice of permitting their agricultural colleges to have a fair share of the money that we are to vote from the Federal Treasury. I know that my State desires that. I believe the Northern States generally would desire it if it were submitted to their people for discussion and decision.

In earnestly expressing this view and indulging this hope, I trust the representatives from the Southern States, looking, as I doubt not they do, to the betterment of the condition of these people, so numerous and so worthy in many ways, will agree that the amendment submitted by the Senator from Washington shall become a part of the law. I shall not detain the Senate longer, but shall await with a great deal of interest the vote on this amendment, which doubtless soon will be taken and which I devoutly trust may be agreed to.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, it was not my purpose to have anything further to say upon this bill. Although I am very much interested in its passage, I had determined to leave its pilotage over the turbulent waters of its further voyage to the wise head and skillful hand of the able and patriotic junior Senator from Georgia. But certain things have been said and objections urged which make it necessary for me to bring to bear whatever influence my limited capacity may carry to prevent the distortion of its terms and possibly defeating the consummation of its splendid purposes. If enacted into law as the bill came from the House, I think it would be a great benefit not only to the farmer, the tiller of the soil, but to all of the American people, because we understand that the farm and its products, the country home and its pure-lived inmates, uncontaminated by-are the enduring substrata upon which all industrial prosper ity rests. Not only is it true that the farmer's toil produces the real wealth of the country, but it is also true that the farmer, as distinguished from other classes, furnishes to-day the larger per cent of the patriotic, incorruptible voters of this Republic. To me one of the most discouraging facts revealed by the last census was the fact that 51 per cent of the population of America lived in the cities and towns. You have but to turn to the pages that record the story of the past to find the evil omen involved in this statistical fact, and the reason of my solicitude for our national future. Man is but the creature of heredity and environment. Human nature is the same in all ages of the world. The same aspirations, hopes, fears, hates, and loves actuate and control men to-day that controlled them 2,500 years ago. The only light we have to guide us in the darkness of the future is the light which shines out from the experiences of the past. The Roman Republic, to a certain extent our great prototype, was strong, clean, virtuous, and true as long as she was governed by the free cultivators of the soil, all of whom, let me impress upon Senators, were Caucasian; but when the rich dwellers in the city became the owners of the land and the old agricultural population was reduced to industrial vassalage, free institutions died and Rome became a despotism under the name of republic. It is the rarest thing in the world that you ever hear of dishonesty in rural politics. Not only is the man who lives in the country honest and patriotic, but it is also a pregnant fact, Mr. President, that from the farm every year go into the cities the virile population which keeps the patriotic spirit alive there.

As a matter of fact, but for the army of red-blooded, healthy-As a matter of ract, but for the army of retributed, hearing-bodied recruits that continue to go from the country to the citles and towns, signs of decay in the urban population would soon manifest themselves. The country is the breeding place of the patriot. He is the product of fresh air and free sunshine the child of the home where virtue abounds, where reverence for God is taught at the family altar, and love of country and duty to the flag are exemplified in the lives of the patriotic father and consecrated mother whose excellency is characterized by "doing the noble things that others pray." It is rare, indeed, that you find the golden-hearted patriot in the gilded palace. He seldom comes from the insanitary section of the "soulless city"-from the congested tenement house. He can not grow in a social atmosphere where character is often below par and reputation at a premium, where "poverty is a disgrace and failure brings despair" and the blurred genuine is of less value in the social countinghouse than a polished counterfeit. The men and women who are to direct the destinies of this Republic, lead it along the paths of peace, direct its commercial and industrial affairs, carry it on to higher, nobler, and greater achievements—in a word, fulfill the hopes and realize the dream of the great men and women who gave it being-will spring from the loins of the men who now live beneath the shadow of the cloud-piercing mountains, whose toil stirs the fragrant soil of the fertile plains, whose happy homes dot the banks of the rushing rivers upon whose bosom floats the commerce of a Nation, or the earnest husbandman who labors on the land down by the "gray waste of ocean," where from early morn to dewy eve "he listens to the multitudinous laughter of the sea "the man who lives close to nature and nature's God-

Who sees God's love in the fragrant rose, His strength in each rolling sphere; Who feels His touch as the zephyr blows, And knows that His mercy for all like a river flows, And his soul has ceased to fear.

To that class of people we are to look, Mr. President, for the perpetuity of our Government, for the preservation in their pristine vigor of American institutions. Now, the purpose of this bill is to help the tillers of the land to discover the hidden treasures of the soil, to devise methods of cultivation which will lessen the burden of farm life by shortening the hours of drudgery, and render more productive the land. Its splendid purpose is to improve the man, enlarge his mental horizon, and give intelligent direction to his efforts. The effect also will be to add comforts to the country home, lighten the burdens of woman, afford greater opportunities to the boys and girls upon whose shoulders soon must fall the responsibilities of home and the burdens of government. I can not see how any Senator on this floor can find an objection to the bill. No argument has yet been made against it. A few statements have been made, but no argument has been advanced against the merit of this measure. Unfortunately its passage through the Senate has been delayed by injecting a question which were better left out. But I do not hesitate to say, Mr. President, that the question thus injected into this discussion, though irrelevant, is of the most vital importance to the South and fraught with greater menace to the Nation than every other social and economic question combined which now confronts the civilization of the century. A distinguished Senator in this Chamber on yesterday referred to it as a "southern problem." He is in part only, correct in his statement. The problem is in the South in its most acute and aggravated form. But it is a national problem-as national in all of its elements as ever emanated from the pregnant womb of time. In it is involved the vital issue of the purify and integrity of Anglo-Saxon blood-the "continuous germ plasma" of the Caucasian race. A proper solution of this great problem is the first and paramount question before the American people. It is susceptible of settlement by the Nation only, and not by any subdivision of the Nation. The whole Nation is responsible for the problem, and the whole Nation must solve The question which we shall consider now, Mr. President, is what is best for both races in the distribution of and the disbursement of the fund proposed to be appropriated by this bill. I was very much impressed by the sublime philosophy proclaimed by my friend the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. It is a tribute to his good heart but has little relevancy to the question at issue. My friend is always interesting; he is always honest, and the affluence of his eloquence is always charming to me.

But he convinces me, Mr. President, that he knows very little about the history of the negro race. His philosophy, if applied to the Caucasian, is absolutely correct. But the negro and the white man are not the same. The difference is antipodal. A study of the biological phase of the problem—"the ontogeny and phylogeny"—of it will make that fact clear—if indeed there could be any doubt about it. No man has spoken more wisely and clearly upon this subject than Abraham Lincoln, for whose genius the Senator from Minnesota has great respect, as we all have. Mr. Lincoln's friendship and devotion to the negro's interest can not be questioned. I call the Senator's attention to the wise words of this wondrous man. In a memorable speech, delivered at Charleston, Ill., in 1858, Mr. Lincoln

I am not nor ever have been in favor of bringing about in any way social and political equality of the white and black races—that I am not nor ever have been in favor of making voters or jurors of negroes nor of qualifying them to hold office nor to intermarry with white people; and I will say in addition to this that there is a physical difference between the white and black races which I believe will forever forbid the two races living together on terms of social and political equality. And inasmuch as they can not so live, while they do remain together there must be the position of superior and inferior, and I, as much as any other man, am in favor of having the superior position assigned to the white race.

Could the question be more strongly presented or more cogent truths embraced in so short a space?

Now, I am going to make a statement which I challenge any Senator upon this floor to successfully contradict. The negro as a race, in all the ages of the world, has never shown sustained power of self-development. He is not endowed with the creative faculty. "God planted the Egyptian and the negro side by side in the fabled Valley of the Nile with equal opportunities. The earth was new; all things lay before all men; no man could borrow from his neighbor, because his neighbor had naught to lend; no man could learn from his neighbor, because his neighbor had naught to teach. Here was the virgin earth, fresh and moist from the hand of the Creator; there was the mysterious sea, and far away in the shining spaces of the night lay the uncounted stars with their lessons spread. All of these were to be conquered. The door of hope stood broadly open and no color line was drawn."

But the door of hope might have remained closed so far as the progress the negro was to make for himself was concerned. He has never created for himself any civilization. He has never risen above the government of a club. He has never written a language. His achievements in architecture are limited to the thatched-roofed hut or a hole in the ground. No monuments have been builded by him to body forth and perpetuate in the memory posterity the virtues of his ancestors.

For countiess ages he has looked upon the rolling sea and never dreamed of a sail. In truth, he has never progressed, save and except when under the influence and absolute control of a superior race. His opportunities have been great. The negro helped to build the temples of Rameses, he polished the columns of Karnak, he toiled at the hundred-gated Thebes, he was touched by the tides of civilization that swept across the Eastern Hemisphere in the forenoon of the ages, and yet it made no more impression upon him as a race than a drop of water on the oily back of a duck. He is living in Africa to-day, in the land where he sprang, indigenous, in substantially the same condition, occupying the same rude hut, governed by the same club, worshiping the same fetish that he did when the Pharoahs ruled in Egypt. He has never had any civilization except that which has been inculcated by a superior race. And it is a lamentable fact that his civilization lasts only so long as he is in the hands of the white man who inculcates it. When left to himself he has universally gone back to the barbarism of the jungle.

Let us consider his condition in Haiti. If you are not familiar with the history of Haiti, I beg you to inform yourselves. You will find in it a pregnant lesson which I commend to your consideration. It will throw a flood of light upon our own American problem. The negro acquired control of this island more than a hundred years ago. Thomas Jefferson said:

This will test the negro's capacity for self-government.

With his usual prescience and foresight, Jefferson predicted failure. But he said:

Let him try it. We will help him.

Haiti was at that time the gem of the Antilles. The most magnificent cane fields, coffee plantations, and fruit groves graced the landscape of that delightful little island. Now shift the scene. Look at Halti to-day, after 100 years of negro rule. After 100 years of assistance by the white man—assistance with money, with example, precept, and all of those superior virtues which characterized the civilization of the white race. What do we find there to-day? Sir Spencer St. John, who represented the English Government at Port au Prince for 20 years, wrote a book entitled "Haiti, or Black Republic." When this English officer first visited Haiti he looked with compassion upon the black man. He thought he had been denied an equal chance in the race of life. He thought he had been the victim of slavery—that the elements of manhood had been stifled by such oppression as some of the distinguished Senators on this floor in this debate have called attention to as having been practiced in the Southern States of America. Yes; he thought "the negro was a sunburned Yankee, who had not been given a square deal."

Sir Spencer St. John remained as the representative of his Government at the court of this black Republic for 20 years. He made a close study of the question. He informed himself as to the racial peculiarities of the negro, and his testimony to the world is that the negro is incapable of self-government. He is incapable of sustaining a civilization all his own. Further than the sustaining a civilization all his own.

ther, he says:

After an experience of 100 years Haiti has proven a failure. There is no semblance of civil government there, except in the seaports, which are dominated by whites and mulattoes.

And he tells us further the disgusting story of the worship of the voodoo and cannibalism, which he says is as common as their sexual crimes in the Southern States of this Republic. Why, Mr. President, the United States Government is in San Domingo to-day as the guardian of that people, having sent agents there to administer their public affairs. Now, I know the negro has made a certain order of progress in the South. He has acquired property. He is acquiring book learning. I am advised that there is a decrease of illiteracy of something like 12 per cent in every decade. There is no doubt about that. But I am going to make a statement which, I dare say, will astonish some of the gentlemen who have shown such honest and sincere interest in the negro's advancement. While he has progressed mentally, he has deteriorated morally and physically. It is a lamentable fact that as a race the negro in America is more criminal to-day than he was in 1861. And certain diseases which were unknown among them before the war are decimating their ranks, filling the hospitals with incurables and the asylums with lunatics. I predict that these diseases will cause a marked falling off in the birth rate in the next decade.

And that is true of the negro in the North, probably more so than it is of the negro in the South. Nobody will deny that, that is, no one will deny it who has any reliable information on the subject. The white people or Pennsylvania to the negro. There he has been given every opportunity that to the negro. There he has been given every opportunity that advancement, and yet, I am advised, that while he is only 24 per cent of the total population of the State of "Brotherly Love," the negro race furnished 17 per cent of the male criminals and 30 per cent of the female criminals. In the city of Washington, a perfect haven for him, where special distinction has been shown him because of his "race, color, or previous condition of servitude," here in this city, where he has been treated as a hothouse plant, where he has enjoyed all the advantages of social, official, industrial, and political equality, we find him, after 40 years of freedom, while only 28 per cent of the total population, his race furnishes 68 per cent of the grist for the criminal courts to grind. It is not uncommon here, at the seat of government, where all of these special favors have been accorded the negro—I repeat, it is not uncommon—to find the pages of the morning papers blurred with the account of assaults perpetrated by negroes on white women on the main thoroughfares of the city.

Now, Mr. President and Senators, I do not want to do anything that will arrest the negro's progress. I would not raise my hand against his material advancement. I believe that I am his real friend. I know him; I understand him in all the relations of life. I have lived with him from my infancy. I was nursed by an old black mammy, the recollection of whose tender ministrations to me are among the sweetest assets of my life. A dear old negro woman nursed every one of our babies. A most faithful, trustworthy, devoted servant and friend was this good old woman. I never permit an opportunity to pass to pay the tribute of my love and respect for her memory. As governor of my State I am sure that I exerted myself as much to protect the negro in the enjoyment of his life, his liberty, the pursuit of happiness, and the products of his own toll as any executive in America has ever done. He does not vote much in Mississippi, but I really think that he votes more than he ought to vote, if he votes at all. I do not think it was ever intended by the Creator that the two races should live together upon equal terms-enjoy equal political and social advantages. One or the other must rule. The people of the South tried to share with the negro in the government of the country after the war, but the negro declined to share with the white man. Black heels rested cruelly upon white necks for many years after the close of the war. The white man endured the negro's misrule, his insolence, impudence, and infamy. He suffered his criminal incapacity to govern until the public domain had been well-nigh squandered and the public treasury looted. saw the civilization reared by the genius of our fathers, glorifled and cemented by their sacred blood, vanishing from the earth, and by means, I will not say in this presence, fair, but by means sufficient, we invoked the law of self-preservation; we arose in the might of an outraged race and as the Savior scourged the money changers from the temple, so the southern white man drove from power the scalawag, the carpetbagger, and the incompetent negro. I shall wait for another occasion to enlarge upon this phase of the race problem. Mr. President, I was interested when my good friend, the learned and eloquent Senator from Illinois [Mr. Sherman] on yesterday asked the question of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Martin], "How many negroes vote in Virginia?" I do not know how many negroes vote in Virginia, but I want to say to the Senator from Illinois that it would be a godsend to every Commonwealth in this Republic if there were no negro votes cast anywhere.

If in the providence of God the negro may make progress sufficient to justify the American people in giving him the franchise, that time has not yet arrived. I believe the Republican Party is getting about as tired of the negro in politics, and I believe the members of that party in this Chamber. If they were candid, would admit that they are about as tired of dealing with him in politics as the Democrats are. I was very much gratified to notice at one of the recent councils of the leaders of the Republican Party that you are trying to devise ways and means by which you may get rid of the pernicious vote of the southern negro in your national conventions. You ought to do it. It is not creditable to any party to pay the price you have to pay for it. O Mr. President, the time has come when we should discuss this question as patriots rather than as partisans. The passions and prejudices generated by the unfortunate conflict of three score years ago have no place in the heart-they should not be permitted to becloud the intellect or distort the judgment of the men who are writing laws to govern this new Republic to-day.

New conditions teach new duties,
Time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward, still, and onward
Who would be abreast of truth.
Lo, before us gleam the camp fires;
We ourselves must pligrims be;
Launch our Mayflower and steer boldly
Through the desperate winter sea,
Nor attempt the future's portals
With the past's blood-rusted key.

God Almighty never intended that the negro should share with the white man in the government of this country; and you can not improve upon the plans of God Almighty or defeat His purposes, either, by legislative enactments. Do not forget that. It matters not what I may say or others may think; it matters not what constitutions may contain or statutes provide, wherever the negro is in sufficient numbers to imperil the white man's civiliaction or question the white man's supremacy the white man is going to find some way around the difficulty. And that is just as true in the North as it is in the South. You need not deceive yourselves about that. The feeling against the negro in Illinois when he gets in the white man's way is quite as strong, more bitter, less regardful of the negro's feelings and conditions than it is in Mississippi. And that is true of every other Northern State. I have been all over the States of Illinois, Ohio, Iowa, Indiana, some of the Western States, and New England States. I know the temper of the white people on this question. I had the pleasure of speaking in the city of Springfield soon after they had had a lynching fest. A negro was thought to have committed an unmentionable crime. The mob got after him. sheriff and his friend carried the negro away in his friend's They returned, and the mob found the negro had cape. To wreak their vengeance upon those who made his escape. undertook to uphold the law they proceeded to destroy the automobile, and they demolished the restaurant belonging to the man who had carried the negro away. A thing of that kind could hardly happen in the South.

The difference between the southern man's conduct in a matter of this character and that of the people of Illinois is this: The southern mob sometimes gets the gullty man and hangs him. In the North, if the mob finds itself unable to punish the beast who committed the outrage, they proceed to destroy property and kill everything of a dark color. Mr. President, I am not the negro's enemy. I know what is best for him. I think I can measure his productive capacity. I know the influences that move him. I am familiar with the currents of passion which sweep through his savage blood. I understand his hates, his jealousies, and his attachments. In a word, I think I know him as he really is. And knowing him, I believe I know what is best for him. You can not measure the negro by the standard you would measure accurately the white man. He is different you would measure accurately the white man. He is different from the white man physically, morally, and mentally. The pure-blooded negro is without gratitude. He does not harbor revenge. He is not immoral—he is unmoral. I have never known one who ever felt the guilt of sin, the goading of an outraged conscience, or the binding force of a moral obligation. The pure-blooded negro reaches mental maturity soon after he passes the period of puberty. The cranial sutures become ossified by the time he reaches 20 years of age, and it is not uncommon to find one who reads fluority at 15 years of age not to mon to find one who reads fluently at 15 years of age not to know a letter in the book at the age of 25 or 30. It was this physical difference which Mr. Lincoln had in mind when he said: There is a physical difference and an impassable gulf between the two Lombroso, the great Italian scientist, used this language: Just at that moment when the Caucasian intellect is spreading its wings for a more daring flight the negro closes up and comes back.

No, Mr. President, the laws suited for the white race are not adaptable for the government of the negro. "The heir of all the ages in the foremost files of time" can not progress if re-"The heir of all strained by statutes intended for the government of the most backward and inferior of all the races of men. Nor can you by law lift the negro and hold him to the high standard which you demand that the white man live upon. As the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] said on yesterday, if the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington be adopted, we of the South shall be compelled to vote against the bill; not in a spirit of enmity, not in a spasm of hate, but because we know what the results will be. There will not be a Southern State that will share in the proposed benefactions of the measure. Mr. President, that Senators on the other side may get some accurate idea of the negro's industrial capacity, I want to read from a well-tempered, thoughtfully considered article written by Mr. Alfred H. Stone, a planter in the Delta of the Mississippi. He gives his experience with the negro in the management of his Delta plantation. This experiment was fairly and honestly made. I know Mr. Stone. He is not only a man capable of understanding and developing all the possible truths involved in this experiment, but he is an honest, just, sincere man, who, I am told, always gives his negro laborers the benefit of the doubt. This will be interesting to Senators who, as I said a moment ago, look upon the negro as a "sunburned Yankee who has not been given a square deal in the race of life":

am told, always gives his negro Inborers the benefit of the doubt. This will be interesting to Senators who, as I said a moment ago, look upon the negro as a "sunburned Yankee who has not been given a square deal in the race of life":

The principal statistical features of the experiment during the five-ment may be thus summarized. We brought and its practical shandon-close of the season of 1898, 30 new families, and began the first year, 1899, with a total of 58. On 1,064 acres of cotton land we made but 450 bales of 500 pounds average, a family average of 7,9 bales. The cotton and seed, brought $21,063,88, or a family average of $37.501. Of the families on the place, 26, or 44,8 per cent, left at the end of the year. We moved in 27 families, and with the 50 which the addition gales as elivated, 1038 acres of cotton in 1000. The crop was $17 cotton and seed, brought $47,541.66. This was an average cash product value of $805,79 per family. The number of families who left the place at the close of the year was 13, or 22 per cent of the total. We shad this year in cotton 1,348 acres, and raised 1,470 bale = 208, to the family. At an average price of 7.90 cents for the cotton this crop. including seed, realized $60,742.04, being $905.77 per family. We lost 16 families this year, 26,2 per cent of the whole force, and moved in 24 1,131 bales of cotton on 1,341 acres. Seed and cotton brought $1,4503.26, the average price of the latter being $0.80 cents per pound. The average product of cotton was 16.4 bales per family, the average value of cotton and seed $191,20. At the end of the year we lost 17 year. This gave us 75 squads for 1003. We cultivated 1,302 acres of cotton and raised 741 bales—9.8 to the family. This brought 11.77 cents per pound, the cotton and seed sciling for $50,527.73 or an average round of cotton and seed sciling for $50,527.73 or an average product of cotton and seed sciling for $50,527.73 or an average product of cotton and seed sciling for $50,527.73 or an average product of cotton and seed sc obstacle is placed in the way of a tenant's acquiring implements and stock, but also that we no longer sell him these things on long time, nor do we otherwise personally encourage their purchase. We simply endeavor to fill the place of each departing renter with a share hand and try to confine such renting as we are compelled to do to such as come to us with stock of their own. In short, we are no longer engaged in the altruistic enterprise of converting sliftless and empty-handed negroes into desirable and well-equipped tenants for the temporary benefit of other planters.

From 1899 to 1903, leaving out of consideration the 30 new families brought in at the beginning of the former year, we moved in 124 families. In the same period we lost 103. Of the 79 families on the place in 1904, but 8 were with us in 1899. Of the 103 who have left, some with little, some with much, not one has become an owner of land. Most have simply continued as tenants elsewhere. Many have lost what they carried away and have become share hands on other plantations. Some have dropped into the ranks of day laborers. A few have drifted into towns. Let me illustrate one of these removals. In December, 1900, we moved in a crew of seven people. They all represented themselves as working hands, though one of the men was over 65, with a wife past 60. Their entire outfit consisted of a horse, worth at a liberal valuation $50, and $58 worth of miscellaneous and indescribable household effects. In December, 1903, while riding over the place one day, my attention was arrested by a procession slowly approaching me. It consisted partly of two wagons, one buggy, two mules, one horse, three cows, two calves, and five dogs, the property of this same crew of seven. In addition they had with them outside wagons enough to assist them in hauling away 285 bushels of corn, $190 worth of household effects (including a sewing machine for each woman and a gun for each man), and a half dozen crates of hogs and several of poultry. During the three years they had

Mr. President, I have read at length for the purpose of showing the gentlemen who manifest such profound concern for the material advancement of the negro, and I want to say-

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President—
Mr. VARDAMAN. I will yield to the Senator in a moment.
I want to say that this is not an exception. The people whom this author has described are not exceptions to the rule; they are the rule, and as they manage their private affairs, so would they us: the public funds, so will they at all times perform official functions. Shiftless, unsteady, improvident, nomadic, utterly unreliable, as incapable of consecutive thought, pertinacity of purpose, calm, conservative, sequential action as a consecutive that the night of vagrant star that floats upon the deep bosom of the night-if left to them to carry out the provisions of this bill, it would be a great disappointment even to you gentlemen who insist upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I did not understand the Senator from Mississippi. Did the Stone quotation, which the Senator has just made, refer to the colored tenant farmer in Mississippi?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes, sir.

Now, to contrast so that Senators may understand the difference between the white man and the negro as a laborer, I want to call their attention to some experiments that were made in that same county with Italians, who did not know when the crop was planted the difference between a cotton stalk and a cocklebur. They were brought over there and put to work on a dead level with the negro, and here are some of the results of their labor. I quote from the same author, Mr. Stone:

labor. I quote from the same author, Mr. Stone:

I shall consider only the cash commodities of cotton and seed, and shall reduce the figures to annual averages.

This gives us the following results: Average number of squads, Italians 52, negroes 167; average number of working hands, Italians 269, negroes 433; average number of acres per working hand, Italians 62, negroes 5.1; average pounds of lint per hand, Italians 2,584, negroes 1,174; average pounds of lint per hand, Italians 403, negroes 233; average cash product per hand (cotton and seed), Italians $277.36, negroes $128.47; average cash product value per acre, Italians $44.77, negroes $26.36. Thus the Italian is seen to have produced more lint per hand by 1,410 pounds, or 120.1 per cent, and to have exceeded the negro's yield per acre by 170 pounds, or 72.9 per cent. The difference in money value in favor of the Italian was $148.89 per hand, or 115.8 per cent, and $18.41 per acre, or 69.8 per cent.

I have simply called attention to this Mr. President in order.

I have simply called attention to this, Mr. President, in order that Senators may understand that there is a difference in races deeper than color or external appearance, and you can not change that difference, or by any kind of legislation impart to the negro superior qualities which God Almighty did not give him in the beginning. As I said a moment ago, there has been much talk indulged in about "his oppression." The negro started life with equal opportunity with the Caucasian. Neither had anything to borrow from or to lend to the other. The white man evolved the civilization that glorifies the beginning of the man evolved the civilization that glorines the beginning of the twentieth century. "It was the wings of his own spirit that bore him aloft"—the qualities within rather than the influences from without enabled the white man to attain the superb eminence which he now enjoys. The negro remained stationary. If you would have the negro progress, if you would promote his material interests by legislation, I submit to you that the best way to do it is to bring about cordial cooperation, invoke the assistance of the white man. You can not do it in any other way. It is true in the North, it is true in the South, it is true in the East, it is true in the West.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes, sir; with pleasure.

Mr. CLAPP. I think we have drifted far amain in this discussion and that much of it is not relevant; but the Senate is anxious to get through with the bill, and much that the Senator from Mississippi has said I shall not reply to to-day. occasion, however, seems to require that I shall do so later. There are several deductions which the Senator has drawn which I shall discuss, and I would not want my silence to-day to be taken as an acquiescence in the deductions which the Senator has made.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I did not flatter myself by thinking that my friend the Senator from Minnesota would agree with me now, but I do indulge the hope that time, as it courses onward, may unroll to his mind the essential truth which may lead him out of the wilderness and that he will come to see this question in its naked enormity.

Mr. CLAPP. What I was going to suggest to the Senator was that he does not seem to take into account in this discussion the difference between the African negro and that large body of people in this country, many of whom have even more Anglo-Saxon blood in them than they have of African blood, and yet are classed in this general and somewhat indifferent manner as negroes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I would suggest to the Senator that in his State, I think, 50 per cent of the negro population have, probably, more white blood in them than they have negro blood. In the Northeastern States—in Massachusetts, for instance there are about 36 or 38 per cent of the negroes who are mulattoes or a little bit more white; in Mississippi only about 11 per cent of the negro population have any white blood in them at all; and in Georgia and South Carolina, I think, it is about 9 per cent; but I want to say to the Senator that the same racial characteristics control both classes. There is very little The mulatto usually inherits the vices of both the mother and father. He has the characteristics of the hybrid and the debased nature of the mongrel. Of course, there are exceptions-freaks of the race-some remarkable men have been the products of hybridization, but they are very few in number, and count for but little in making up the general average of the race.

Mr. CLAPP. That may be true in the South, but, rejoining to the Senator as the Senator has so often to us, I claim a more intimate knowledge of the situation in my State than the Senator from Mississippi can have of the situation there; and the situation which he depicts as to his State does not apply to the colored people of my State.

Mr. VARDAMAN. As a matter of fact, if the Senator will pardon me-

Mr. CLAPP. I ask the Senator's pardon for interrupting him. Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not at all object to being interrupted by the Senator from Minnesota. He is always courteous and agreeable. But I want to say to the Senator that the negroes in his State, as a race, have increased in crime, and the percentage of crime among them as a race in his State to-day is greater than it was 20 years ago.

Mr. CLAPP. Well, Mr. President, I would very seriously question that statement.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I can only speak in the language of the statisticians, and men who live north of Mason and Dixon's line are the men who gathered the statistics; and I am sure they did not doctor the figures to the detriment of the negro.

Mr. CLAPP. Yes; that is the trouble with an argument that drifts from the issue. I do not want to take the time now to discuss the value of statistics. You could prove by statistics that foreigners commit the crime in this country, when those of us who have been prosecuting officers know from our experience that they do not. The man lacking in familiarity with our laws and our customs and not having our ability to employ counsel is arrested for something, railroaded through court, and then he figures in statistics as a criminal, while the shrewd Yankee, familiar with the law, having political influence, and possessed of means, gets off; and then, lo and behold! statistics show one thing, while facts show another.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator from Minnesota will take the trouble to send to the Congressional Library and get the works of Mr. William F. Willicox, a member of the faculty of Cornell or Columbia University, on the Criminality of the Negro, he will find that my statement is correct.

Mr. CLAPP. As I said, I want to leave the last word with the Senator from Mississippi. I simply want to say that I am not at this time disposed, and I do not think I ought, to take the time to follow the discussion, but I do not want my silence to be taken as acquiescence in the deductions made by the

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think that anybody would think that; I am very sorry that there is not some foundation for such a suspicion; but I want to say, Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that the negro has progressed mentally. He is, as I said a moment ago, reducing the percentage of illiteracy between 10 and 12 per cent every decade. A larger majority of the young negroes in Mississippi can read. We are furnishing them schools which run from four to nine months in the year, and the white man pays the bill. As I said here on the floor yesterday, the negro has had opportunity that was never before afforded to an inferior race at somebody else's expense; he is acquiring property. But this progress is not making a better citizen of him. You can not understand it, but I tell you in all solemn candor he is a thousand times more criminal to-day as a race than he was in 1861.

There never was a more faithful, trustworthy protector of the southern white woman, or white womanhood anywhere, than was the old slave during the war and immediately following; and it is a startling fact that I am going to announce at this moment that every white woman in the black belt of the South to-day is living in a state of siege. The sons of those faithful, well-behaved servants—or slaves, if you prefer—with all of their superior schoolbook learning and improved opportunites, have become the rapist and the rabber. The care, the protection become the rapist and the robber. The care, the protection, the safeguards that are thrown around the white women are a thousand times more rigid-greater vigilance is kept than were thrown around our mothers 100 years ago on the frontiers, where the wild man and the wild beasts roamed at will. These are facts, and you can not deny them. The Senator from Minnesota can not understand that; but if he should live in the black belt of the South for a little while—if his wife and daughters could live there, they would soon feel the dampening effect of that black cloud of peril which hovers over the devoted head of every white girl and woman in the South to-day.

No; I am not an enemy to the negro; I want to educate -or rather train him-along proper lines; I want to train him in a way that we may improve his hand and educate his heart; I want to build, if possible, a moral substratum upon which to rear this mental superstructure; but if that is not done, with his ideas of morality, or as Froude, the historian, would put it, his ideas of "unmorality"—when you enhance his mentality without building this moral substratum, upon which it is to rest, you simply increase his capacity for harm. Your education will only serve to make a less desirable citizen.

I want, first, to build the foundation. The white man and the negro of the South are not enemies. They may be made so if you continue to insist on trying to bring them into abnormal relationship. The relations that existed between them before and immediately succeeding the war was akin to that of father and son. My recollections of the black folk on the farm during my boyhood are among the pleasant memories of my life. The negroes in Mississippi know that I am not their enemy. I would not permit them to vote, but I would protect them in the enjoyment of their life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness and the product of their toil. And if the white people of the South are permitted to proceed along proper rational lines, knowing and recognizing the negro's inferiority, desiring, however, his betterment; if they are permitted to work out, although handicapped, as they are, with laws which were conceived in hatred and brought forth in a spasm of venom and revenge—if they are permitted to do it, Mr. President, in their own proper way, very much more progress will be made for the negro's uplifting, for the negro's improvement than will be made if it shall be directed by men who do not know any more about it personally than I do about the political economy of the planet Mars.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, to recur to the subject matter before the Senate, I venture to say that the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], as I understand, would accomplish the purposes sincerely desired by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Vardaman]. It is not un-usual for men who agree as to the ends to be attained to differ from each other as to the means of accomplishing those ends.

We find ourselves in that condition to-day.

I would not add to the difficulties of those who are carrying the burden alluded to by the Senator from Mississippi. had any prejudices, I would lay aside every one of them in order to help. I believe, without any regard to the mere geographical residence of any Member of this body, that we ought earnestly to join with our friends who have a very large percentage of negro population to produce the best possible results in bringing about their advancement and in making them fit to carry the burdens incident to American civilization.

I know that the emancipator is quoted as to almost everything nowadays. Lincoln has been quoted as authority almost as often to support many economic fallacies as he has in the matter of the liberation of the slaves, and men have indulged in surmise as to what he would do if he were present on earth He said at Charleston, Ill., substantially what the Senator from Mississippi quoted, but he said more. He said:

Because I do not want the black woman for my wife, it does not necessarily follow that I therefore want her for my slave.

Speaking in 1858, he said:

I do not believe in admitting the negro to the rights of citizenship so that he may serve on juries, that he may hold public office, and that he may engage in such governmental action as his white master.

In the same year, in the same course of debates, he said that he was not endeavoring to interfere with slavery in the locality where it then existed. He wished to confine it to the territory where it was found, where wise limitation had left it, where the fathers intended, because of its being a local institution, that it should remain. He protested against its spread, against various acts of legislation that came from the Congress of the United States, against various decisions of courts, local and otherwise, against various efforts made to make free soil in the West and the Northwest additional territory in which this local institution should be allowed not only to be planted but to spread, making the Kansas and Nebraska territory the vantage point from which future efforts should be made to carry it still farther forward to the Pacific coast.

He believed in confining the institution at that time, in 1858, where it then was; he believed at that time what the Senator from Mississippi has quoted from his Charleston (Ill.) speech. In less, though, than five years from that time he wrote a proclamation that literally destroyed the local institution wherever it existed. If he changed his opinion on one

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator yield for a question?
Mr. SHERMAN. With the greatest pleasure.
Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator does not seriously announce that Abraham Lincoln ever favored social and political equality between the negro and the white race, does he?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not social equality; no, sir; he did not. Mr. VARDAMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; but up to the very time of Mr. Lincoln's death he told the negroes who came to him here in Washington, "You will not be permitted to share in the government of this country, and I am not prepared to say that you ought to be, if I had the power to give you that right."

He said further: "The shackles of slavery will be stricken from your arms. You, the educated and more fortunate members of your race, take the others and go to some country"—his idea was the same that Jefferson's was—"and there work out your own salvation." I do not pretend to quote Mr. Lincoln The great desire of his patriotic heart was that the literally. friction might be avoided by deportation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, there is no controversy between the Senator and myself on this phase of the racial question. I do not think at any time any declarations were made which can be authenticated by documentary evidence, historic or otherwise, in which Lincoln contended that there ought to be social equality of the two races living side by side.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon, but Lincoln always used the words "social and political equality." I have made a very careful study of Mr. Lincoln's I have made a very careful study of Mr. Lincoln's ideas on this question, and I have said often, and I repeat here, that my views and his on the race question are substantially identical. He had a vision; he saw the end; and, next to Thomas Jefferson, I think Abraham Lincoln understood the race question better than any man in his day living north of Mason and Dixon's line.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish, Mr. President, to go into this at length, but I restate, in order that we may understand each other, that there is no controversy as to Lincoln's views on the social equality of the two races. There is a controversy as to the other matter. I do not agree at all that in latter days Lincoln disclaimed political equality. I think, on the contrary, evidence is accessible to show that he believed in latter days that some degree of political equality was inevitable. Whether he believed in the full extension of that equality in accordance with the fifteenth amendment as it was adopted is open to ques-

As has been said by a Senator on the floor-I think it was the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Gallinger], but possibly it was some other Senator—it might be questionable whether the fifteenth amendment, coming at the time it did and putting political rights in the hands of a great number of persons of no experience and education, might not have been too great an advance at that time; that some degree of preparation could well, from a governmental point of view, have been had prior to the vesting of this right. The thirteenth amendment was adopted in 1865; the fourteenth amendment was adopted on July 21, 1868, and the fifteenth amendment in 1869. Of course the authority alluded to passed away in April, 1865, so that it was not given to him to give expression to his views at that

What I want to do, if such a hope may be properly indulged in by me, is to be of some service in helping do some good, at least, in this matter. It is a vexed one. Political equality is something that I am not wishing to discuss at this time; I shall not go into it, and I hope it will never be necessary to go into it at all in this Chamber. We have radically different views on that question. They may arise from our environment; they may arise from our different methods of thought or from the different views we take of the governmental possibilities of two diverse races living in constant contact with each other, especially where the relation of master and servant once existed and had been rudely and suddenly severed by the result of the Civil War.

These are matters which I believe men of my generation rather than to take them up in a spirit of prejudice should take them up as dispassionately as possible, so that all the area which at one time suffered a very great readjustment of values consequent upon the immense loss of property might be in some degree improved, if possible, by legislation wherever it can be

I never go over any of the 11 States that unfortunately undertook to set up a separate government without a feeling of sadness. Every battle field, every old chimney standing, every ruined or abandoned plantation, and every statistic of life and property lost is only a further evidence of the immense wave that the American race had to encounter before it settled, as far as legislation and war can settle, these controversies. This problem is something that the men of our generation have inherited from our predecessors, and I think if anything can be done in a spirit of dispassionate discussion toward its settlement it ought to be done. I believe all-at least nearly all of us, and I hope all of us-feel that way about it.

It is true when that question is raised between the two races living side by side the same results usually follow. I have never been one of the men living in a Northern State who has pointed with indignation to the men of my own blood who by violent means have meted out such rude justice on the spot as they thought commensurate with the offenses which they took it for granted had been committed. I think if the two races living side by side in equal numbers in any part of the country had presented to them the same question the same inevitable result would follow when lawless instincts are aroused. At no time have I ever indulged in criticism of one section more than another because of the numerous cases of lynching that have occurred in various parts of the Union. All are reprehensible in the highest degree.

There are about 120,000 negroes living in my State, and approximately 40,000 of them are voters. The larger part of them are found in the cities and are classified under the head of "urban population" in the census reports. Many of them are from Alabama and Mississippi, coming. by way of St. Louis, up the Mississippi Valley on the railroads, which make our portion of the country easily accessible to them. In a smaller way, but not in a detailed way, I am sure, we have to a certain degree some of the same questions to which the Senator from Mississippi alludes. When he states the immense burden that the white man is carrying in Mississippi and elsewhere where the circumstances are similar I can not fail to have with him a certain sympathy, not perhaps in the extreme degree to which he manifests it in stating his argument here, but in some degree, at least, I feel his difficulty and the difficulty of others situated in like manner and in similar surroundings in trying to solve some of these questions in justice to all.

In my home city, it is true, as the Senator from Mississippi has said, a riot occurred, and for two whole days and nights the authorities were helpless. The same question arose that often arises where there is a numerous negro population in the Southern States. It was suspected that an outrage had been committed. It was afterwards ascertained that this was wholly erroneous and that there was no outrage then committed in the city of Springfield, although it was thought at the time that there had been. Conclusive evidence was produced by medical authority that it could not have occurred and did not occur.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But the fact that the mob acted as it did only goes to show how easily race prejudice is inflamed and to what extreme white men will go in such cases, regardless of the geography of their residence. It is the race instinct which has been in all the ages of the world so potential in preserving the purity of the Anglo-Saxon.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think there is any difference in locality. They are all alike. I have not any doubt about it. I know they are just the same in my part of the country as they are in other places across the Ohio River. It took 4,000 troops, that cordoned and guarded the city of Springfield for a week, to reduce society to its normal state, but it was done. Several men were killed, and several men went to the hospital; but order was restored, and it was found when men recovered their senses that no outrage had been committed by anybody, as suspected at first.

I am only stating this by way of explanation, and not at all as a matter of pride. Nobody regrets the occurrence more than myself. It happened in my home town, where it was given very wide publicity throughout the United States, and very unpleasant notoriety at that; but it occurred. It occurred at Charleston, Ill., and the same thing has occurred in various Northern States. The Senator from Mississippi and I can have no controversy on the result when the same lawless causes present themselves in any part of the United States. It is possible that it might be more restrained by the authorities in some places than in others. That depends entirely upon the strength of the local government.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I desire to assure the Senator that my reference to the occurrence in Springfield was not made in any censorious or unfriendly spirit whatever.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I had the misfortune to have several similar occurrences of that kind in my State when I was gov-

In the city of Jackson, the capital of the State, where an outrage was perpetrated and the community, of course, was very much incensed, I was fortunate in being able to control the mob. We made a very careful search of the city that night for the perpetrator of the crime. A great many arrests were made. The homes of a great many negroes were visited, and the suspects were put in fail. In the morning, when I returned to the executive mansion after having been in my returned to the executive mansion after having been in my saddle all night, a messenger came to announce that a mob had assembled at the jail and that they were battering down the door. I made my way there, and when I reached the jail they had broken the lock on the door and gotten the man out. They had a rope, and they were yelling, "Crucify him! Hang him!" I dismounted from my horse, took the man away from the man and put him back in jail. I succeeded in dispersing the mob, and put him back in jail. I succeeded in dispersing the mob without calling even a policeman to my assistance. I had the negro tried. He was tried by a court and a jury of 12 white men in the following summer, and he was acquitted. He happened not to be guilty.

I mention this merely to show you that the spirit of hostility to the negro in the South is not so intense and so bitter as certain gentlemen would have you believe; that really there is a kindly feeling. Sometimes they catch the man who commits an outrage and they hang him; but they do not molest any other members of the race, nor do they interfere with their usual vocations nor destroy their property. That only goes to show, and it was my only purpose in referring to the incident, that where you had to call out 4,000 State troops to quell the riot, I alone, the governor of the State, went there and took the man from the mob and put him back into jail and protected him until I found out that he was not guilty, and then he was acquitted and went his way.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois permit me to ask the Senator from Mississippi a

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.
Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I listened very attentively to the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi, but I must confess I was somewhat shocked by the statement he made that the laws that were conceived in prejudice, and I think he said—
Mr. VARDAMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not say that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Perhaps I did not catch the Senator's language. I want to be correct about it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; the Senator did not catch it. I said we were trying to work out the negro's salvation; we were trying to improve his condition; we were trying to solve this question as best we could, handicapped by a law—and I referred to the fifteenth amendment—which I said was conceived in a spirit of hate, generated by the conflict between the sections, and brought forth in a spasm of venom and revenge, not to benefit the negro, as you know, but to punish the southern white man for the rebellion. I did not refer to laws made here.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Of course the Senator from Missis-

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Of course the Senator from Mississippi understands that I would not put him in a wrong light. I thought I understood the Senator correctly. His statement was not specific, but I anticipated he was aiming at the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Where these outrages occur, the larger the city the greater the difficulty of quelling the resulting disturbance that always occurs. A large part of it, when it is started, comes from the lawless element that gathers as a fringe on every mob. The members of that element have no purpose whatever to serve except to promote disorder, to destroy life, to burn the town, to ruin property as much as possible. There is a spirit of loot that is released whenever an occasion of this kind offers itself. The bonds of civilized society seem to be temporarily dissolved, and then nothing but martial law restores a condition of order.

In three cases of which I have known and which I have lived through that has been done locally. Order has been restored by calling out the National Guard where violence has occurred, and very often it has been done by the use of loaded guns. In the case of the Springfield mob it took loaded guns to disperse some 1,800 men, as nearly as we could count them, who were very resolute in their lawlessness; but it was done. This, however, did not immediately grow out of the controversy that came from the supposed outrage. It came from the lawless element that is incident to a city of any size after it passes a population of twenty-five or thirty thousand.

To resume the discussion of the main question, I want to be just as brief as I can. I am quite certain we all realize the difficulties. Possibly I and others who live in my latitude do not realize them so acutely as do the gentlemen from the different States farther south. What provoked my interest in this matter yesterday was the fact that certain Senators seemed to say that because they were constantly surrounded by these questions they were better adapted to settle them, and in one or two cases it seemed to me it was rather suggested that because of their superior means of knowledge their opinions should not be criticized. It was not put in words in just that way, but I gained that impression from the general air of the statement, Perhaps I was not entirely justified. That, however, is what led me to intervene as I did and as I shall now.

I will concede a great deal to those who are facing this problem. We have some of it in the territory where negroes are domiciled in my own part of the country. We have in my home town about 6,000 negroes. They are largely quartered in one place, as is often the case not only in Northern but in Southern States. The political question, however, has nothing to do with the economic question, and I do not wish to discuss it any more than is really necessary to repel any suggestions that have been made. I do not care for the political end of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very glad to hear the Senator make that statement. I have been listening to this discussion for some time, and it has seemed to me that we have covered a very wide field in the discussion. It certainly is not a question of social equality. It certainly is not a question of political equality. It is a question of economic equality that I think is of the most interest here, and that is what I understand the Senator now to say.

If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, I suppose hardly any of us here entertain the idea of social equality. We differ somewhat about the question of political equality—that is, the South has one view of the capacity of the colored man to participate in government except as he may educate himself and make himself capable, and the North has a different view of that question. That, however, is not what we are discussing here to-day. The question before us, as I understand, is whether the particular bill now pending before the Senate will, in its practical workings, do an injustice to the colored man and be a discrimination against him in his economic relation to the balance of the populaton of the country.

Briefly, I do not think there is much difference between any of us about that question. I think both the people of the South and the people of the North feel that in the matter of working out his destiny here the colored man ought to have an opportunity, like any other man, to better his condition in life. I am certain that is the feeling in the South. Whatever may be the feeling in the South about social equality or political equality, I am certain there is but one sentiment there on the economic question, and that sentiment is that in the race of life the colored man is entitled to an equal opportunity with the white man, and that his rights ought not to be abridged or denied him wherever the question is that of making a living for himself and his family.

In the matter of education, in my State, and, I think, in most of the Southern States, we try to be just to the colored man. It is true that as a matter of fact we do not give him per capita the same amount for the education of his children that we give per capita for the education of the white children; but I think if the Senator will investigate the matter he will find that in nearly all of the Southern States we have practically the same school term for the colored children as for the white children. There is not a single school district in my State that has not both a colored school and a white school, and I think I am safe in saying that there is not a single school district in my State where the school term of the colored children is not just the same as the school term of the white children. That is, we give them the same number of days in their schools that we give the white children, and we divide the fund upon that basis. That is the equitable basis, because it does cost a little bit more to educate the white child than it does to educate the black child.

The same rule is carried out, I think, with reference to our State institutions. We have our colored normal school and we have our white normal school. We have our colored agricultural and mechanical school and we have our white agricultural and mechanical school. We divide our school fund upon that basis, and I think the proportion of colored children in my State who are enrolled in the schools to-day is equal to that of the white children who are enrolled in the schools to-day. The only difference between our treatment of the colored children and the white children in reference to schools and that of the State of the Senator from Illinois—because I have talked with him about the subject to-day—is that in Illinois there are no separate schools for the colored children. They all go to the same schools.

If the fund we are talking about were to go to the agricultural and mechanical colleges there would be some foundation for the claim that there ought to be a division of it so that the colored agricultural and mechanical college would get its reasonable proportion of it and the white agricultural and mechanical college would get its proportional part of it. That, however, is not the purpose of the bill. There is not a dollar appropriated in the bill that is to be expended in the education of the colored students in the colored agricultural and mechanical college or the white students in the white agricultural and mechanical college. You can not, therefore, segregate it in that way. This fund is for the sole and exclusive purpose of carrying farm-demonstration work to the farmers in the different sections of the country. Of course in that statement I am leaving out the provision of the bill with reference to the distribution of literature. I am speaking about the part of the fund which is to be devoted to demonstration work. Practically all of it, I think all except 5 per cent, is to be devoted to demonstration work.

The question is, How is the fund to be devoted to demonstration work to be controlled? Is it to be controlled so as to establish two systems of demonstration in the State—one under the control of the colored college for the colored farmer, and one under the control of the white college for the white farmer? I think if Senators will look at the matter in that light—and that is the practical way to look at it—they will see that it would not be practical, it would not be good economy, it would not be a wise method of distributing this fund and dividing this work to establish two systems of demonstration in the several States. If that is not apparent upon the most casual consideration, an analysis of the actual farm situation in the sections of the country where the two races are found together, as they are in the South, will show that that would be an impracticable, unwise, and uneconomic method of distributing and managing this fund.

Take the ordinary farm in the South. As I stated here the other day, we have not yet gotten away from the big plantations in the South. Before the war we had these big slave plantations in the sections of the country where the negroes mostly now reside. They have not been broken up. They have not been subdivided into small farms. That is a great misfortune. It has been a great handicap to the South. The sooner they are divided the better it will be for us—the better for the white man and the better for the colored man.

man and the better for the colored man.

As long as they are kept together as they are now and rented out as they are now you will find on every big farm in the South probably an equal number of white tenants and of colored tenants. Sometimes, and in many sections of the State, the colored tenants will predominate, but you can find a number of white tenants upon every one of those large farms,

Would any practical man seeking to carry information to the small tenant farmers upon a big farm, we will say, of 5,000 acres, one-half colored men and one-half white men, employ two demonstrators, one a white demonstrator and one a black demonstrator, and have the white demonstrator go there and demonstrate to the colored tenants, and have the colored demonstrator go there and demonstrate to the white tenants?

Leaving out the segregation of farms and bringing the farms of a community or of a township together, you may have 15 or 20 of these large farms in one township. One demonstrator can do the entire work for that township. One demonstrator now is doing the entire work in the largest counties in my State. If you segregate this work and give one-half of it to the colored college and one-half of it to the white college or divide it according to colored and white population, each employing a demonstrator of its own race, in the particular township or community where you have a dozen farms divided up between white tenants and black tenants you have one demonstrator going there one day to demonstrate to the colored man and another demonstrator going there the next day to demonstrate to the white man. Is it not very much better to put this fund under the control of the colleges and let them select the demonstrators?

The Senator has said that in his State there are 120,000 colored voters.

Mr. SHERMAN. No; that is the colored population. Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator said "voters." Mr. SHERMAN. No. We have approximately 120,000 colored population.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought 120,000 was a very large number of voters. Does the Senator believe it would be wise in his State to appoint colored demonstrators on account of the fact that he has this colored population there? Does the Senator really believe the colored man has advanced to such a stage of knowledge with reference to agriculture that it would be wise to appoint a colored demonstrator in a county in his State for the white man and for the black man, both together? Does he not think it would be better in his State to appoint white demonstrators?

I ask the Senator that question in all candor and frankness. I have no prejudice about it. I do not want this great bill, which I believe is of immense importance to the farmers of this country, handicapped by an unwise and an uneconomic provision, a provision that would result in a division of this fund that in my judgment would make it ineffective. I do not want to see that done.

I do not think this race argument is necessary. I think we have strayed far afield in injecting it into this question. I do not think in my State it would be wise to appoint a colored demonstrator in one county, because he would necessarily come into contact with the white farmer, and I do not think the white farmer would think himself benefited by such information as he could get from the colored demonstrator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President-

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do. Mr. VARDAMAN. I simply wish to beg the pardon of the Senator from North Carolina for not getting instructions as to the course I should have pursued in my remarks.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, Mr. President, I am not in any way reflecting upon the course the Senator from Mississippi has pursued in the argument. I am trying to present this matter in the way it occurs to me. I think the practical question we are dealing with, and the only question we are dealing with, is whether, a community about equally divided between white farmers and colored farmers, we ought to divide this fund and appoint one colored demonstrator and one white demonstrator. is what it seems to me it would lead to if we are to divide the fund between the two colleges of a State where there is a white agricultural and mechanical college and a colored agricultural and mechanical college.

That is the only idea I wished to inject into the speech of the Senator: and I wanted to ask him whether or not he thought that would be a wise thing to do.

Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from North Carolina as to the irrelevancy of much that has come in; but the responsibility is about equally divided between the two sides of the Chamber. It is almost impossible sometimes to discuss anything that raises the question even incidentally, without traversing much of this territory. not know that it is time lost, because there is about so much of it that has to come out anyhow, and the sooner it comes out the better.

The real question here on this amendment is whether, when we make the appropriation, we ought not to give directions to the hand that holds the purse. That is a wise precaution that it is sought to place in the bill by the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones]. After it has once passed beyond the stage of a bill and is a statute, and the appropriation has become available, it will be too late. So, incidentally, it is of some importance here; and I can understand readily how the discussion drifted into the phase of whether the different State authorities, legislative or otherwise, can be trusted to take this money coming from Federal sources and apply it wisely and justly in all of the States of the Union, unless there is some sort of protection such as is contained in this amendment.

The question is asked here whether two demonstrators in agricultural extension work could go out into the field and give the necessary instruction without a waste of money; whether it is not a waste of money to double the force, and thereby impliedly double the expense.

I would rather waste money than do an injustice, even though it be public money. I would rather waste some dollars for some years than fail to do all that can be done for an element of our population that needs this assistance much more than the white man needs it. Here we are self-helping. The white man takes care of himself.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that if the demonstrator were a white man he would be as much interested in instructing the colored tenants as to the best methods of farming as he would in instructing the white tenants? The Senator from Georgia made it very clear yesterday, in his very forceful argument, that the returns to the landowner, where the tenant system prevailed, depended absolutely upon what the tenant was able to dig out of the land, whether he was a white tenant or a black tenant. The landowners in the South are just as much interested in the black tenant cultivating his land so as to get the best results out of it as in the white tenant cultivating his land so as to get the best results out of it, because the rent of the landowner depends upon the yield of the crop, whether that crop is cultivated by a black man or a white man. So the white people, who own the bulk of the land, are just as much interested in having the colored farmer properly instructed in the rudiments and in the science of agriculture as they are in having the white man who tills the soil instructed in the same way. That being so, if the white man controls this fund, will he not have the same interest to instruct the colored farmer that he will have to instruct the white farmer? Where is the foundation of the Senator's fear that the colored farmer will not be given an equal opportunity for instruction under a white demonstrator that would be given him under a colored demonstrator?

Mr. SHERMAN. That, of course, led to the original introduction of the irrelevant matter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from North Carolina has spoken of the colored land tenant.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; we have more of those than we have of negroes who own land, but we have a good many who own

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There are a great many?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. For instance, during the last census period the negroes of the South increased less than 10 per cent in population, but they increased 17 per cent in the ownership of farms against a 12 per cent increase of white farm owners. In North Carolina the farms cultivated by white owners in-creased only 9 per cent, but the farms cultivated by negro owners increased 22 per cent. That is the increase in the Senator's own State.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very glad to see that the colored folks in my State have made such a fine record.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator dispute it? Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not dispute it. I take pride in the fact that they are doing so well in my State. But I do not see that that militates against the argument I am making. was addressing myself to the white tenant and the colored tenant. We have white men who own small farms and we have colored people who own small farms. The white people of my State are just as much interested in the colored man who owns a farm succeeding in making money as they are in the white man succeeding. He buys from the merchants; he makes mortgages; he is a member of the community. They are just as much interested in the colored man cultivating his small farm successfully as they are in the white small landowner cultivating his farm successfully.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But the progress the negro has made and is now making is a very remarkable tribute to his constancy

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it is. Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Prof. Branson, of Georgia, whom the Senator from Georgia personally knows, says:

Nearly one-fourth of all the negro farmers in the South own the farms they cultivate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not dispute the statistics. wherever they can do so they are buying land. I think it is a very good sign. I am glad whenever I hear that one of them has accumulated enough to buy a farm and become an independent farmer; and I am very glad when I hear of a white tenant who has accumulated enough money to buy a small farm, because I think the hope of the South is in dividing up our large land holdings into small properties.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The negroes are making marvelous progress in that direction.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator says the colored man has bought a larger per cent of farms than the white man. I expect that is probably true, because the colored man in my State is more distinctively an agriculturist than the white man. Since we began, as the Senator knows, the marvelous development of our factories in North Carolina, extending practically over the whole State, the white people have gone more into manufacturing. They have gone more to the towns and engaged in commerce and in the industries that center around the villages and towns than have the colored people. I think in recent years a larger per cent of colored people have remained in agriculture than white people, and that, I take it, would account for the fact that a larger per cent of them have bought farms and become landowners than white men.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The same relative increase in land ownership by the negroes extends through nearly all the Southern States. For instance, in Florida they own nearly onehalf of the farms they cultivate; in Kentucky and Oklahoma, more than one-half of the farms they cultivate; in Maryland and Virginia, more than three-fifths of them; and in West Virginia, nearly four-fifths of them.

In less than 50 years the negro has acquired possession of 20,000,000 acres of farm land. Altogether his farm properties are valued at nearly $500,000,000. Negro land holdings in the aggregate make an area a little larger than the State of South

That is marvelous progress from slavery and serfdom.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is a very gratifying statement. Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It seems to me that in making appropriations for the encouragement of agriculture you ought not to overlook the tremendous strides that the colored man has made in the South in land ownership, and Senators ought not to withhold from him the scientific information that you give to others.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the very point I am making. it not proposed to withhold from him any information that we give to the white man. Let me say to the Senator there is this fact about the colored man, and it is very gratifying: He is very anxious to acquire the independent ownership of land. He is very anxious to acquire a home. He is very anxious to acquire

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is the only chance he has to better his condition.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a very good sign, and I am very glad that is true. As soon as the colored man is able to buy a piece of land and can find a piece of land of a size that he is able to buy, he invests his money in it, and if he has not the money and can get credit he will buy it on credit.

The colored people of the South are, as the Senator says, becoming independent landowners at a very gratifying pace. They are becoming educated, as the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones] demonstrated by his figures here the other day. They are taking great interest in education, and the rate of illiteracy among the colored people in the South has decreased very rapidly in recent years, and it is going to continue to decrease.

Now, let me ask the Senator from Michigan if the white people of North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida, the States that he read about a little while ago, were not kindly disposed toward the colored people, if they were disposed to oppress them, if they were disposed to withhold from them their just rights, if they were not trying to help them to become good and useful citizens, does he believe that the colored people would have ever acquired these large holdings of land, and does he believe that in those years they would have reduced their rate of illiteracy to the extent that has been demonstrated here they have done? From the fact that they have become to such an extent within the few years they have been out of slavery landowners in the South, and have within those few years so far removed themselves from the state of dense ignorance in which they were at the time of their freedom, does not the Senator think that is evidence that the southern people have been fair and just toward them; that they have lent them a helping hand and taken great interest in matters that affect their intellectual and their moral and their material welfare?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would be lacking in candor if I did not admit that the progress which I have cited has occurred in the South among your people, and I would not say that you have oppressed them.

Mr. SIMMONS. Would you not say we have helped them? Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think you have compressed them. Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know what the Senator means by

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think you have limited their opportunities for growth and restricted their field of development. That is what I mean. I do not say you have oppressed them, but you have limited their opportunities, and, notwithstanding the unfavorable conditions which surround their race, they have gone to their task with stout hearts and the firm purpose to accomplish something for themselves, and they have done it, to their everlasting credit; they now own $500,000,000 worth of farm property, a tribute to their enterprise and their courage and dauntlessness,

I do not and I would not cast any reflection upon the State of North Carolina or any other Southern State. I know that you are confronted with a serious problem; but if these colored people, so recently out of bondage, have been able to gather together in 50 years $500,000,000 worth of farm property more land than constitutes the entire State of South Carolina-I think that is rather a high tribute to the latent characteristics of their race. I have no hesitation whatever in saying it.

Neither is that the only field in which they have excelled. The Senator from North Carolina knows that every profession honored by colored men-teachers, lawyers, merchants, doctors, bankers-every line of employment and profession shares its complement of successful negroes. If they have been able to accomplish this under the limited opportunities which have been theirs, I say it is vastly to their credit; and I do not understand why the Senator does not rejoice with me in their achievements. It is greatly to their credit, but it is not to our credit if we fail to recognize it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator happen to have before him the statistics that show to what extent the colored people in Illinois have advanced in acquiring the ownership of land?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I have not any statistics on

Mr. SIMMONS. Has the Senator anything to show that they have made greater progress in agriculture, in the acquisition of homes, in education in the Northern States where they are found now-in many of them in large numbers-than they have made in the South?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I can not speak for the State of Illinois. That State is very ably represented here, and the Senator from Illinois, by whose courtesy I am speaking, can answer for himself; but I can speak for my own State. It is with pride I say that in one of the counties of my State there is a township where there is not a foot of land owned by other than colored farmers. In the township of Calvin, in the county of Cass, in the State of Michigan, every farm is owned by a colored man and every officer of that township is a colored man. They have their stores and their trading posts, and they are a prosperous and happy people.

Mr. SIMMONS. What the Senator has said is very interesting. Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was tempted to do it be-

Mr. SIMMONS. I just wanted——
Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Twelve little pickaninnies from the South, caught up by a beloved woman whom I knew well and transplanted from unfavorable conditions in the South to our varying climate, have grown and prospered until that dozen pickaninnies left for their children, and they will leave for their children's children, the land of an entire township in the State which I have the honor to represent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I merely wish to find out from the Senator why this segregation. We do not have that condition down in my country. I do not understand why in his State the colored people are segregated to themselves and no white people live The two races live in juxtaposition in my among them. country.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They were not segregated by law. Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator explain why that is the

Is there any need for it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator knows that there are sections in the Senator's own State which colored men seem to prefer to other sections.

Mr. SIMMONS. The section in which they were residing at the close of the war

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Exactly.

Mr. SIMMONS. In the eastern part of the State; but they are very largely scattered all over the State.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why were they residing there? Mr. SIMMONS. They are not there segregated. Will Will the Senator state why they are segregated in his State from the whites?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have segregated themselves. Mr. SIMMONS. Why have they segregated themselves?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Because there was opportunity for their betterment; they have their schools and their churches and their own societies. The same situation exists in North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Not to any considerable extent.
Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not rise for the purpose of getting into any controversy with the Senator from North Carolina, because I know this is a very difficult and vexation. problem, but I do not see how you can in frankness and in justice ask us to differentiate between people who are to be the beneficiaries of our law. Why not apply these experimental tests and training so that all will get the benefit of it? The Senator says that the white agent would not perhaps enjoy instructing the colored farmer, if I caught his words correctly.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the Senator is entirely mistaken. Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thought I caught his words correctly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said that the white demonstrator would have just as much interest in instructing the colored farmer as he would in instructing the white farmer, because I said that the landowners and the community are just as much interested in the colored man making a good yield from his crop as they are in the white man making a good yield. Therefore the white demonstrator would have the same interest to help the colored man to better methods of farming that he would have to help the white man. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator from North Carolina believe that the colored farmer in the South will get his full benefit from this appropriation?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not the slightest doubt, Mr. President, that if this bill passes the colored farmers of North Carolina and of the South, whether they are tenant farmers or owners of their own little farms, will get identically the same benefit from the instructions that will be given by the department, State and National, in farm demonstration work that the white people will get. There will not be the slightest difference in the world.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There are two and one-third millions of colored people now engaged in agriculture. They ought to have some consideration. I hope they will get it, and, as far as my vote goes, I will see that they do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I should like to submit to the Senate, if the Senator from Illinois will allow me—

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A proposed unanimous-consent agreement to vote to-morrow; but I do not want to formally submit it until I ascertain whether or not Senators present object to it, because it is useless to have a roll call and bring all Senators here if anyone present objects. What I propose is this:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that not later than 4 o'clock on February 7 the Senate will proceed to the consideration of House bill 7951, and during that calendar day vote upon any amendment that may be pending or any amendments that may be offered and upon the bill through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after 4 o'clock on February 7 no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes on the bill, nor more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment.

Mr. President, before I ask for consent to the agreement I

Mr. President, before I ask for consent to the agreement I wish to say that I expect to call the bill up at 2 o'clock promptly Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator from Georgia, in his proposed unanimous-consent agreement, specify the calendar day?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I specify the calendar day. Mr. GALLINGER. I think it ought to be the calendar day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have so framed the request. I know the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] wishes to take longer than 10 minutes, so I was going to suggest that we will have 2 hours with unlimited debate, and perhaps the Senator can present his argument during that time.

Mr. STERLING. I expected to say what I have to say in offering my substitute for the pending bill, but that would depend upon when the amendments should be disposed of. the amendments shall be disposed of before 4 o'clock, so that I can previous to that time offer my substitute, I suppose I shall have time enough to speak upon it; but I should like a little longer than 10 minutes for that purpose. I think perhaps 20 minutes would be as much time as I would wish in which to present the substitute and to speak with reference to it. think, Mr. President, that I am willing to take the chances in regard to the matter.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to have the Senator do so.

Mr. ROOT. Would it not be wise to call this bill up immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, fix a time for voting on the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. Jones], and then let the remainder of the unanimous-consent agreement stand?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am willing to make any satisfactory arrangement so that I can dispose of the bill to-morrow.

Mr. ROOT. That would obviate the difficulty of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], who does not want to offer his substitute and to speak upon it until he knows what is done with the amendments to the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. When I suggested this morning a unanimous-consent agreement, Senators declared that the suggestion to have a unanimous-consent agreement to vote during the same day that the suggestion was made was unheard of, and I am just a little afraid that, if I wait until to-morrow, the same view might be again taken.

Mr. ROOT. Suppose the Senator makes it that the bill be called up to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal; that a vote be taken upon the pending amendment at 2 o'clock; and then let the vote be taken upon the other amendments under the 10-minute rule, beginning at 4 o'clock?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am afraid I would find objection from the Senators who are interested in the resolution which has gone over until to-morrow. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Noeris] is in charge of the resolution which we had under discussion to-day, and which went over without prejudice until to-morrow. I will say to the Senator from New York that his suggestion would be perfectly agreeable to me if I should not run against an objection from a different source.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. May I ask that the proposed unanimous-consent agreement be restated to the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will restate it, so that the Senator will catch it at once. It is that at 4 o'clock to-morrow we proceed to vote upon the bill and the amendments through the parliamentary stages; that after 4 o'clock no speeches upon the bill or upon any amendment shall be longer than 10 minutes; and that we shall dispose of the bill during the calendar day of to-morrow.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Georgia. Why not make it 3 o'clock, and then give 15 minutes debate on amendments? That would probably meet the situation with reference to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If that meets the approval of Senators present, I will change the request for a unanimous-consent agreement to 3 o'clock and allow 15 minutes debate on amend-

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course that means that we might have to sit here until 12 o'clock to-morrow night?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but I hope not. Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hope not, too.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I promise not to take a great deal of the time myself.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand that the Senator's proposition refers to the legislative day or the calendar day of to-morrow?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It refers to the calendar day. Mr.

President, I first ask that any Senators who have any suggestions to make upon the matter may do so. I am willing to accept the suggestion, beginning at 3 o'clock, to limit speeches to 15 minutes. If there is no objection on the part of any Senator present to that suggestion, I will put it in that formal shape and send it to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the rule, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst Brady Brandegee Bristow Gronna Hitchcock Hollis Hughes Nelson Newlands Oliver Overman Simmons Smith, Ariz. Smith, Ga. Smith, Mich. Smoot Stephenson Sterling Swanson Thompson Vardaman Bryan Chamberlain James Johnson Jones Kenyon Owen Page Poindexter Ransdell Chilton Clapp Colt Kernon Kern Lee, Md. Lodge Martin, Va. Martine, N. J. Myers Root Cummins Dillingham Fall Saulsbury Shafroth Sheppard Sherman Walsh Weeks Fletcher Gallinger Shields

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. Lane] is detained from the Senate on business of the Senate.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SHIVELY] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to state that the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] is unavoidably absent.

Mr. CHILTON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is unavoidably absent from the

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that on Saturday. February 7, 1914, immediately upon the conclusion of the reading of the Journal, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 7951, to provide for cooperative agricultural extension work, and that at not later than 3 o'clock p. m. on that calendar day the Senate will proceed under the 15-minute rule, that will permit no Senator to speak more than once or for a longer period than 15 minutes upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, that is not the request for unanimous consent which I submitted. My writing may be a little difficult to read. This is the proposed unani-mous-consent agreement which I read to the Senate:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that not later than 3 o'clock on February 7 the Senate will proceed to the consideration of House bill 7951, and during that calendar day vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that after 3 o'clock on February 7 no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon any amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?
Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President—
Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to inquire if that applies to the time in this legislative day, or does it begin to-morrow?

Mr. LODGE. To-morrow.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Only after 3 o'clock to-morrow.
Mr. BRANDEGEE. Who has the floor, Mr. President?
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut has the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If I have the floor, Mr. President, I should like the privilege of saying a few words.

If I caught the language of the agreement as proposed by the Senator from Georgia, it provides that not later than 3 o'clock to-morrow we will proceed with the consideration of this bill. That fixes no definite time for beginning the consideration of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is already the unfinished business, and can be taken up at 2 o'clock; but if the Senate were willing we might take it up earlier than 2 o'clock.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That would require another unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.
Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why not?
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We can take it up earlier than 3 o'clock. The agreement provides not later than 3 o'clock. The object of the proposed unanimous-consent agreement is to provide that after 3 o'clock debate on the bill and amendments shall be limited to 15 minutes, that not more than one speech shall be made by any Senator on the bill or any amendment, and that the bill be disposed of during the calendar day.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not object to that part of it.

Mr. SKANDEGEE. I do not object to that part of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill is already the unfinished business and can be taken up at 2 o'clock, or we can take it up even earlier during the day. The proposed agreement says "not later than 3 o'clock."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask the Secretary to read the first part of the proposed agreement again. I understand the last

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that not later than 3 o'clock on bruary 7 the Senate will proceed to the consideration of House February bill 7951-

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, would not that displace this bill as the unfinished business?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would be compelled to rule that it would, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That would be unfortunate for the bill. I suppose that I should yield, then, to the opinion of the Chair without regard to my own continuing opinion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Georgia that he say "not later than 2 o'clock" as the time to take up the bill, and that after 3 o'clock the conditions which he has provided shall prevail.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am willing to do that, Mr. GALLINGER. That is very much better. The Senator could move to take it up at 1 o'clock under the rule, so that not later than 2 o'clock would be entirely proper.
Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I will change the request for unanimous consent so as to read "not later than 2 o'clock."
The VICE PRESIDENT. Is those edication?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, unanimous consent has already been given that the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. Norris] should go over until to-morrow without prejudice.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Suppose that resolution is under consideration at 2 o'clock?

Mr. GALLINGER. It would fall.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It would then be displaced.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can answer that question. The resolution of the Senator from Nebraska should have gone to the calendar, but, by unanimous consent, it was permitted to lie on the table as a resolution coming over from the preceding day

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And that would be superseded by the proposed unanimous-consent agreement of the Senator from Georgia if it were entered into?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Or by the unfinished business.
Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Chair ruled, I understood, that the proposed agreement, if entered into, would supersede the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; because it was put off until 3 o'clock

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Georgia if he will not make it the legislative day——
Mr. GALLINGER and others. Oh, no.

Mr. BRISTOW. So that we will not have to stay here until late at night. There is no occasion for night sessions thus early in the session.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are Senators here who have to be away on Monday. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. Cum-MINS] has to be away on Monday, and a number of Senators have asked me to make it the calendar day. I do think we ought to finish the bill by 6 o'clock to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia? The Chair hears none, and the agreement is entered into.

The unanimous-consent agreement as finally entered into is as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock on February 7 the Senate will proceed to the consideration of House bill 7951, and during that calendar day vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that after 2 o'clock on February 7 no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 15 minutes upon any amendment.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE BREMNER, OF NEW JERSEY.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. ROBERT GUNN BREMNER, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read. The Secretary read the resolutions (H. Res. 400), as follows: IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 5, 1914.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. HUGHES. I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk, and ask unanimous consent for their present consideration.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. Robert Gunn Bremner, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the Vice President, to Join a committee appointed by the House of Representatives, to take order for the superintending of the funeral of Mr. Bremner at Passaic, N. J.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that at a future day I shall ask the Senate to set aside a time in which to consider resolutions on the life and public services of Representative Bremner. As a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to, and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 7, 1914, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 6, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who hast ever been our refuge and our strength, a very present help in trouble, our hearts turn instinctively to Thee in this time of sorrow. The silver cord has been loosed, the golden bowl broken, the soul of another Member of this House has crossed the great divide.

None knew him but to love him; None named him but to praise,

His sunny smile and cheery words from a warm, sympathetic heart will be missed by us and by a host of friends in all the walks and conditions of life. Strong, brave, noble, generous, Thou hast called him to the realm from whence no traveler returns. But blessed be Thy holy name for that profound faith and eternal hope which fills our breast. He may not return to us, but we shall go to him, to be greeted once more by the warm clasp of his hand, the bright smile, and cheery voice. Be this our comfort and solace to those who are bound to him by the ties of kinship.

To live in the hearts we leave behind is not to die.

The faith, the hope, the love born of Heaven will live on forever. Thus may we cherish his memory. Thus may we press forward with brave and manly hearts, trusting in the undying love of a heavenly Father who doeth all things well. In the name of Him who taught us that life is stronger than death.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LINCOLN MEMORIAL.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 107 and pass the same

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 107, relating to supervision of the Lincoln Memorial, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That in the exercise of its control and direction for the construction of the Lincoln Memorial, authorized by act of Congress approved February 9, 1911, the commission created by said act shall designate to perform the duty of special resident commissioner to represent the commission in the oversight of the work, the Hon. Joseph C. S. Blackburn, recently appointed a member of the Lincoln Memorial Commission, as the successor to the Hon. Shelby M. Cullom, deceased; and for the special service of the member so designated he shall be entitled to receive compensation at the rate of $5,000 per annum out of the appropriation for the construction of such memorial.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to take this joint resolution from the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. Sherley, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CHARLES L. THORNTON-LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

Mr. Underwood, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies the papers relating to H. R. 20061, for the benefit of Charles L. Thornton, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ARMY AND NAVY MEDAL OF HONOR ROLL.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. Sherwood, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 12179) to establish in the War Department and in the Navy Department, respectively, a roll designated as the Army and Navy medal of honor honor roll, and for other purposes, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

BRITISH MUNICIPAL TRADING UNDERTAKINGS (H. DOC. NO. 710).

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed as a House document the report of Albert Hal-stead, consul of the United States at Birmingham, England, on the result of British municipal trading undertakings, which contains valuable statistical tables that seem to be of unusual importance.

I have conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Printing and submitted the document to him and also to the representative of the Government Printing Office. I find that 8,000 copies can be printed for $200 and 24,000 for $300. As the article is sought by the Department of Commerce for distribution, It occurs to me that we had better print 24,000 copies.

Mr. BARNHART. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Georgia if he has conferred with the Department of Commerce as to the number of copies they think they will need?

Mr. ADAMSON. They were very modest. I did ask them that question, and, without going into the details of the computation, they said they would be satisfied with 10,000 copies. Eight thousand copies can be printed for $200 and each additional thousand copies for $6.15.

Mr. BARNHART. My recollection is that in a conversation by telephone yesterday they told me they thought 5,000 copies would be ample; and I think therefore, Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the gentleman from Georgia-

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, do I understand that the request is to print this document for the use of the Department of Commerce?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir. They want 5,000 copies, I think, but the rest of us would like to have a few.

Mr. MANN. If they want 5,000 copies, why do they not print them?

Mr. ADAMSON. They say they have not sufficient funds. I have a letter from the Secretary of Commerce—
Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit; we pass appropriation bills fixing the amount of the appropriation for printing in each of the departments. They always say they have not enough. Thereupon very frequently somebody comes to the House and proposes that the printing shall be done out of the appropriation for printing for Congress. That is in order to let the department use its appropriation without paying for the printing that it wants done and the printing is charged to Congress. Then, after awhile the department refers to the enormous bills for printing for Congress, and points out how scant the appropriations are for printing for the departments.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to print them and take all of them ourselves and let the department look out for itself; but I should like to answer all inquiries by having read the letter from the Secretary of Com-

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is short. The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY, Washington, February 3, 1914.

Hon. W. C. Adamson, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

My Dear Judge Adamson: May I invite your thought for a moment to the inclosed letter to me from the chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce and to the papers that he sends with it? These papers are, in brief, the report of Albert Halstead, consul of the United States, at Birmingham, England, on the results of British municipal trading undertakings, and they contain statistical tables that seem of unusual importance and such as would be of general public interest and usefulness. They should be made public through some governmental agency, but our department has not means at present for doing this. It has occurred to me that, as chairman of your important committee, this is a matter that you could ask to have printed as a public document. I shall be very glad if you can do so, and would suggest that if practicable it be so done.

Yours, very truly,

William C. Redfield.

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, Secretary.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, pertinent to this question of printing I want to ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing a question about the rules relating to the printing of speeches. I have found that it costs more money to get 2,000 copies of a speech printed than it does to get 5,000 copies of the same speech printed. On two occasions I have ordered 2,000 copies of a speech printed, and was informed that I could get them for less money if I would get 5,000 copies

Mr. ADAMSON. Less per thousand copies?
Mr. RUSSELL. No; less for the whole number, they told me.
The SPEAKER. The Chairman of the Committee on Printing is interrogated.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, in reply to that—
Mr. RUSSELL. You will find that they charge more if you order 2,000 copies than they will if you order 5,000 copies.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. At that rate, it would appear that if the gentleman would order enough copies printed, they would not cost him anything.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, let us have one man talking at a time. When two or three gentlemen talk at once it is impossible to understand what they say.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] to answer the question of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I can not answer that question. What the gentleman states is news to me. I can not understand why the Government should charge more for printing 2,000 copies of a speech than it would charge to print 5,000 copies of the same speech. If it is doing so, it is certainly perpetrating a wrong, and there is no business theory of which I have ever heard that would justify any such method as that. My impression is that the gentleman from Missouri has misunderstood the matter, and that the rate per thousand is less when 5,000 copies are ordered than the rate per thousand when 2,000 copies are ordered.

The SPEAKER. This has nothing to do with the request of the gentleman from Georgia, anyway.

Mr. ADAMSON. It does not apply to my proposition. After the first 2,000 are printed we can get other copies printed at the rate of $6.15 a thousand. I shall be satisfied with 8,000 copies. The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE-CARNEY AGAINST SMITH.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio sends to the desk a privileged report, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 396.

Resolved, That Claude S. Carney was not elected as a Representative to the Sixty-third Congress from the third congressional district of Michigan; and Resolved, That John M. C. Smith was duly elected as a Representative from the third congressional district of Michigan to the Sixty-third Congress and is entitled to retain the seat which he now occupies in this House.

The SPEAKER. Is this a unanimous report?
Mr. POST. It is, Mr. Speaker, a unanimous report.
The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolu-

The resolution was considered and agreed to. [Applause.]

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. ADAIR in the chair.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, this is the first day that there has been any opportunity for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Claims. I therefore move that the committee proceed first to the consideration of those bills reported by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MANN. It is also the first opportunity that other bills have had.

Mr. POU.

Mr. POU. But this is claims day, under the rule. Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I think the language of the rule provides that claims shall have preference on this day.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, the ruling has been that bills reported from other committees than War Claims on this day can come up in the regular order, the same as claims day. That was an arbitrary ruling in the last Congress, arbitrary because otherwise these bills would never be reached at all.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman says, it was made in the last Congress?

Mr. MANN. Yes. The old rule before the last Congress gave preference to the Committee on Claims over war claims on a certain Friday, and war claims over claims on a certain Friday, without reference to bills reported from other committees. When you revised the rules you put in a provision that bills from the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims should have the preference, which gave no opportunity for the consideration of bills reported from another committee unless there was no bill from the Claims or War Claims Committee. The Chair ruled that it was not the intention to change the prior ruling; that the only preference of the claims bills was over war-claims bills, and the only preference over war-claims bills was the claims bills.

Mr. POU. Now, Mr. Chairman, I maintain that under clause 6, Rule XXIV of the rules of the House, bills reported by the Collimittee on Claims have the preference to-day, no matter what may have been the ruling of any former occupant of the chair in the Committee of the Whole.

On every Friday except the second and fourth Fridays the House shall give preference to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims, alternating between the two committees.

If the English language means anything, it means that on to-day, which is not the second Friday, which is not the fourth Friday, preference shall be given first to what? To bills reported by two committees. What two committees? The Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims. It seems to me that it would be impossible for the English language to make anything plainer than this, that on to-day the committee shall give preference to the consideration of bills from these two committees. Now, there is a further qualification to it that on a certain Friday preference shall be given to the Committee on Claims over the Committee on War Claims, and that on a certain Friday preference shall be given to the Committee on Claims over the Committee on Claims. But there is no qualification to the rule that on this day preference shall be given to bills reported by the two committees named.

Mr. MANN. What the gentleman from North Carolina says about the reading of the rule I think is correct. I think no one who reads the rule, without regard to the history of the rule, would say that the gentleman's contention was not correct. Under the old rule, prior to the last Congress, the preference that was given under the rule was simply a preference to the Committee on Claims over War Claims, and on War Claims over Claims on war-claims day. I called the attention of the House in the last Congress to the fact that under the rule as proposed then there would be no opportunity for the consideration of reports from another committee than claims and war claims if the rule was strictly construed.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.
Mr. HARDWICK. I happened to draft this rule, and as the rule reads and as it ought to be construed, undoubtedly on the first and third Fridays, while the Claims Committee comes first. the other committees would have a chance.

Mr. MANN. No. Mr. HARDWICK. On the first and third Fridays these two committees have the right of way. The rule so states in the plainest and most unmistakable language. There can be no excuse for any contention that there is anything muddy about it or anything that is not clear or fair. On the first and third Fridays the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims alternate and have preference over other committees reporting private bills. But on the second and fourth Fridays that is not true.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is an incorrect statement of fact, because on the first and third Fridays bills from the Committee on Pensions and Invalid Pensions have the prefer-Unless these committees run out of bills there is no chance for any other committee to have a bill reported on a Friday. That matter was ruled upon.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Of course that meant they would have Mr. HARDWICK. their chance only after these committees got through.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. The rule meant that, and we knew that when we drew that in that way.

Mr. MANN. Then, the gentleman ought to have advised the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole of that in the last Congress

Mr. HARDWICK. It does not make any difference if there has been a mistake about it in the ruling of some Chairman of the Committee of the Whole in the past.

Mr. MANN. This matter came up several times in the last Congress, and every Chairman who occupied the chair ruled-Mr. HARDWICK. Can the gentleman cite the rulings?

Mr. MANN. I can not cite them at this moment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the gentleman remember there was more than one?

Mr. MANN. I do remember it came up more than once.

Mr. HARDWICK. We might as well settle it now again, because if it was ever settled that way, it was settled wrong,

Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentle-Mr. POU. man from Illinois [Mr. MANN], having in mind the statement of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] as to the meaning of this rule, I am going to ask the Chairman to rule on this question again. I do not care what the ruling has been heretofore, as I said a while ago. If anything on earth can be made plain, it is that these two committees under the rule have preference on certain days. I beg the attention of the Chair for just one moment. It is not true that if the Chair rules that way it means there will be no opportunity for consideration of other bills on the Private Calendar. The Committee on Claims has only half a dozen bills on the calendar to-day. I do not believe it will take over an hour to dispose of them; it certainly ought not to. Then the other bills on the calendar can be considered. I do not challenge the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, but I do not remember the ruling to which he

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. POU. If there was such a ruling, it was in the teeth of the language of this rule. Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will remember this, I think: That in calling the calendar in the last Congress on privateclaims day, bills from other committees were considered in regu-

Mr. POU. I do remember that bills were considered. My recollection of what occurred is this: That the point was made of which the gentleman speaks, and in order to cut the knot—the Chair did not rule upon it—I made a motion that we take up bills from the Committee on Claims, and the motion prevailed.

Mr. MANN. I do not say the gentleman may not have done that, though I think he asked unanimous consent to do that.

Mr. POU. No: I remember distinctly that I moved on at least one day, and I think on two, to take up the bills from the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MANN. By unanimous consent, but the Chair ruled on the proposition.

Mr. POU. I will be through in just one minute. I think this matter ought to be settled now. The Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims have a great deal of work. The Members of the House are interested in these bills. We have been doing our best to put them on the calendar, and it is in the interest of the early consideration of bills in which you are interested that the rule should be followed. It means the setting aside of two days, and that on those days preference should be given to claims in which you are interested and which the Committee on War Claims reports. We ought not to have to fight for a chance to consider bills from the Committee on Claims on days clearly set apart to that committee. I say no other construction can be put upon that rule than that on to-day the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims shall have preference.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I do not remember the ruling that has been referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann]. I have a distinct recollection that such a ruling was made, but I do not remember now what Chairman made that ruling.

Mr. MANN. I do not remember who was in the chair, but I will say to the gentleman. The it was made several times, I will say to the gentleman. question was raised by gentlemen on the Committee on Claims on several occasions.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This is the first time my attention has been directed specifically to the matter.

Mr. POU. I do not find any reference to it in the digest. Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is since the rules were revised, at the beginning of the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. MANN. The Digest of Rules is not up to-day. Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I know that is true. Chairman, I want to submit this observation to the Chair. I do remember very distinctly since this discussion has come up a discussion that was had in the Committee on Rules, and a discussion that was had on the floor of the House when the rules were brought in at the beginning of the Sixty-second Congress. I remember very distinctly that the geutleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] and the gentleman from Penusylvania [Mr. Dalzell] at that time, during the course of some remarks I myself was making on the rules, called attention to the fact that this would give precedence to claims and war claims over those bills coming from other committees. It was the purpose of the Committee on Rules to do that, and it was stated, Mr. Chairman, in the debate at that time that it was the purpose to do that—to put claims and war claims on precisely the same plane that pensions are on now and have been on for years. I apprehend that if upon a pension day some gentleman should undertake to call up a bill from some other committee than the Committees on Pensions or Invalid Pensions, as the case might be, the point of order would be promptly made and would be sustained. The language was so changed in making this rule as to, in express terms, put claims and war claims upon exactly the same plane as Pension Committee business. That was the very purpose of it, and I think the Chair would be not only justified but vindicated-

Mr. GARNER. Compelled.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Compelled, yes, to so hold. Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I remember the discussion, although I do not remember interrupting the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] or his statement. In the discussion about the rules at the beginning of the Sixty-second Congress I charged that that would be the result of this rule. I remember it was very vigorously denied on the other side of the House.

Mr. HARDWICK. By whom?

Mr. MANN. I do not recall now. I was endeavoring to make a point against the rules. Now, it is immaterial to me whether these bills have an opportunity to be heard or not. I never had any of them myself. But what will be the result?

Mr. POU. You have one now.

Mr. MANN. I have no bill reported from the Committee on Claims, and have not had for years. I might want to have, but I have not had one yet.

Mr. POU. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I think the Committee on Claims has a bill to which the gentleman's name is attached as having introduced it.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt I have introduced many of them, but they have not received favorable consideration. Now, I am not complaining about that. What will be the result if the Chair rules that bills from other committees can not be taken up until all the bills reported from the Committee on Claims are disposed of? Every old Member of this House knows that after a few weeks the calendar is filled with reports of the Committee on Claims, and usually from the Committee on War Claims. If you say that a bill from any other committee can not be taken up on any day until the claims bills have all been disposed of on claims day, or the war claims bills all disposed of on war-claims day, or the pension bills all disposed of on pension day, why, you leave these bills in the air and might just as well never report them.

Mr. HARDWICK. Why can not the question of consideration be raised on the Claims Committee and on the War Claims Committee, and why can you not stop it in the House?

Mr. MANN. You can not raise the question of consideration on these bills?

Mr. HARDWICK. Why not?

Mr. MANN. The motion is to go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARDWICK. You can defeat that, can you not?

Mr. MANN. That would not help you. The motion is to go into the Committee of the Whole for consideration of private bills under the rules. If defeated, you will not get to the other bills all day. You can not make a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on private-claims day for the consideration of a particular bill. There is no way of getting to it if there is anything ahead of them on the calendar.

Now, that matter was presented in the last Congress, and I made the same argument then that I am making now, simply for the purpose of having the matter decided. The Chair then ruled that it was not intended by the rules to change the prior ruling on the subject. Now, if the gentlemen do not desire to have the same ruling in this Congress that was made in the last Congress, the rule being the same, it is a matter of imma-teriality to me. I have no interest in these bills as reported from other committees. In fact, in the main I am opposed to these personal bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and from other committees, to give some special preference to some officer or ex-officer of the Army or the Navy over what other officers receive. It might just as well never be reported as to say they never can

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Chair is prepared to rule, I do not want to take any time, but there are certain observations which I would like to make.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will make my statement very brief. This rule is as plain as the English language can make it, and if any chairman of the Committee of the Whole in the past has made any mistake or given any improper ruling on it, the time to correct it is now. The rule provides:

On every Friday except the second and fourth Fridays the House shall give preference to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims, alternating between the two committees.

Mr. CAMPBELL. On what page is that?
Mr. HARDWICK. I am reading from clause 6, Rule XXIV.
Now, the intention of the Committee on Rules when they drew this rule was to do just what the rule says, namely, on the second and fourth Fridays of each month to give to the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions the preference over all other committees reporting bills on the Private Calendar and on the first and third Fridays to the Committees on Claims and War Claims. We put them on exactly the same basis. Their claims of preference and priority rest on exactly the same language, and no Chairman of the Committee of the Whole can rule that war claims and claims do not have preference over all other private business on the first and third Fridays without necessarily ruling that pensions and invalid pensions lose their preference on the second and fourth Fridays of each month. The preference in each case rests on the same language. It is plain and unmistakable. There is no room for controversy about it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] suggests it will give these bills preference. That was the very reason the rule was written that way. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] may not prefer the rule to be written that way, but that we did not take him into consultation with reference to that, and we wrote it just as we meant it, and the House adopted it just as we meant it. And unless the Committee on War Claims and the Committee on Claims have this preference on the first and third Fridays of each month, then the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions have not the preference on the other two Fridays, because the right rests on the same language in each instance, and it is as plain as language can be. We changed the old language of this rule for that very purpose. We said it was fair to treat these committees exactly alike, and let the preference in each case rest on the same identical language, and there can be no doubt about it. I care not what some unnamed gentleman who may have presided over the Committee of the Whole in the past has ruled, when this matter was not argued out and when the point was not fairly and fully considered. It is the duty of the present occupant of the chair to follow the rule just as it was written.

Mr. POU. Just one word, if you please. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Hardwick], I think, has made it very plain that unless the Chair construes this rule to mean that the bills from the Committee on Claims are entitled under the rule to consideration to-day, then the Committee on Claims has no preference at all over anybody or anything. It would likewise be true that the Committee on Pensions will have no preference over any other bill from any other committee.

The CHAIRMAN. It would have a preference over the Committee on War Claims, would it not?

Mr. POU. Does the Chairman mean the Committee on War Claims to-day?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. POU. That would be true; but I contend that as a practical result it would mean that in the face of that ruling to-day, on the point of order being made, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole would be compelled to direct that the calendar be called from the beginning.

Now, the Committee on Claims has nearly a thousand bills pending before it. We have seven subcommittees at work all the time. The Members of this House are entitled to have their bills considered, and I appeal to the present occupant of the chair to construe this rule in accordance with its clear intention, as stated by members of the Committee on Rules.

What occupant of the chair has ruled to the contrary? unnamed occupant, on some forgotten day, may have made such a ruling, but it is not recorded anywhere, so far as it has been stated in this House. I have no recollection of any such ruling, though I will not say such a ruling was not made. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] is always accurate, and I would not challenge his statement; but if that statement is correct, then the time has come to change the ruling here and I have not seen a Member of this House who does not agree that a proper construction of this rule would require that bills from the Committee on Claims shall have consideration to-day. Almost every hour of the day the Committee on Claims is being Almost every hour of the day the Committee on Claims is being called up by Members wanting to know whether we are going to call up their bills on the following Friday. What answer can be given them, with nearly a thousand bills pending in that committee? Mr. Chairman, this rule should be considered in accordance with the clear and palpable intent of the men who drew it—that these private claims should be considered. ered first, and that then we should take up other bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I recall that a number of years ago an attempt was made, while the Committee on Claims was considering bills, to call up a bill that had been reported by the Committee on War Claims. That precipitated a parliamentary discussion that consumed two or three hours in the day as to whether or not the bill reported from the Committee on War Claims was in order on that day.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, that was prior to the Sixty-second Congress?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes; that was prior to the Sixty-second Congress.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Having that fact in mind at the time we revised the rules at the beginning of the Sixtysecond Congress, we put that language in, removing it from the realm of doubt.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It happened that I was in the chair at the time, and I had to hold that, as the rules then existed, a report from the Committee on War Claims was not in order at that time. Whether the rule as now revised accomplishes the purpose or not, I am very sure that it was the intention of those who drafted the rule to give an equality of opportunity for consideration to the bills reported from both of these committees.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit again, I think unquestionably it does not, because the committee in revising the rule had in mind the ruling which had been made upon pension language, and it used the same language with regard to claims and war claims that had been ruled upon in regard to pensions.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am very sure that the intention was to give these bills similar status on claims day, and I think that a consistent ruling and a proper construction would give that ruling to this rule as it now reads.

The CHAIRMAN. The present occupant of the chair did not know he was going to be called upon to preside, and did not know that this question would be raised. Clause 6 of Rule XXIV provides that-

On Friday of each week, after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, it shall be in order to entertain a motion for the House to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar in the following order: On the second and fourth Fridays of each month preference shall be given to the consideration of private pension claims and bills removing political disabilities and bills removing the charge of desertion. On every Friday except the second and fourth Fridays the House shall give preference to the consideration of bills reported from the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims, alternating between the two committees.

The present occupant of the chair does not pretend to be a parliamentarian, but as he understands the rule, and from the information he has upon the subject, he is inclined to believe that this clause means exactly what it says, and in view of that fact the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to express the hope that the parliamentarian will make a note of the rule, so that we may at least hereafter have a consistent ruling, even though we change parliamentarians?

Mr. HARDWICK. If you go wrong once, you had better get right, no matter who is the parliamentarian.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Georgia at some future time might argue on the other side. [Laughter.]
Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no. The gentleman from Georgia will not do that

Mr. MANN. He was doing it two years ago.

NEW ENGLAND STEAMSHIP CO.

Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 9848. The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it. The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9848) for the relief of the New England Steamship Co. Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the New England Steamship Co., owner of the American steamer Commonwealth, injured in collision with the U. S. battleship New Hampshire, on or about July 7, 1912, in or near Newport Harbor, for and on account of the damage to said steamer Commonwealth by reason of said collision, may be submitted to and libel against the United States filed in the United States district court in the district in which suit has been or shall be commenced by the United States to recover for the damage to the said battleship New Hampshire resulting from said collision, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due, either for or against the United States, upon the same principles and measure of liability, with costs, as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same rights of appeal.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due the said New England Steamship Co. as owner of said steamer Commonwealth, the amount of the final judgment or decree therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That said suit shall be brought and commenced not later than four months after the date of the passage of this act. A bill (H. R. 9848) for the relief of the New England Steamship Co.

Mr. Chairman, I think there ought to be an explanation or statement given regarding the bill. I notice there is no report at all from any department on the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it is very true that there is no report from any department, but it appeared to the committee that there was a collision between a vessel owned by the New England Steamship Co. and a Government vessel. The Government has filed a suit in one of the courts of New York, I believe, against this steamship company for damages. The purpose of this bill is simply to allow the steamship company to file a cross action in the suit that is now pending in order that the whole question as to liability for the accident may be determined and stated in the one suit.

It will be noted that there are several amendments. there was nothing in writing from the department, these amendments were adopted at the suggestion of the department. The amendments are in regard to alleging that certain injuries occurred and certain damages were done. The bill as originally drafted stated that the vessel had been injured and certain damages had been suffered. These amendments were offered because of suggestions that came from the department. understand it, there is no objection whatever to the bill on the part of any Government official.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Russell). Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Certainly.
Mr. MANN. If this bill should pass and become a law, and the steamship should file its cross libel and obtain a judgment. on that, would it not be just like an ordinary judgment against the United States?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. It was not the intention of the committee that that should be the case.

Mr. MANN. What was the intention of the committee?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. The purpose was to do as has been done in several instances by this House, simply to allow the evidence to be heard and the matter adjusted in that particular.

Mr. MANN. It is to permit a judgment to be taken against the United States, is it not, if the facts warrant it? Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I think that would be the effect of it, according to the way the bill reads.

Mr. MANN. The payment of ordinary judgments against the United States is provided for in the general deficiency appropriation bill. Why should you provide in this bill that this judgment should be paid without taking the ordinary course of a judgment against the United States?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. As I have stated, it was not the purpose of the committee that we should depart from the ordinary procedure in that respect.

Mr. MANN. Then section 2 of the bill ought to be stricken out, except the proviso, which might be attached to section 1.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. Section 2 is stricken out.

Mr. MANN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. There is a committee amendment striking out section 2.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how many prints of the bill there are. The copy of the bill which I have, as reported from the Committee on Claims, strikes out of section 2 a part of the language in line 16 and puts other language in place of it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. The Clerk informs me that there were two prints of the bill. The later print strikes out section 2.

Mr. POU. Here it is, stricken out.

Mr. MANN. How is it possible for the committee to report a bill with an amendment to a section and have the bill so printed, and then report another print of the bill with different provisions in it? It seems to me that when we get the print of a bill reported, especially where it has amendments printed in it, we ought to know that we can rely upon that, and not have the committee then file some other bill as their report.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. The first print was an error on the part of somebody at the Printing Office.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I daresay that the Printing Office does not take the liberty of striking out the language in section 2—

Suit shall be brought and commenced-

And inserting in lieu thereof the words-

Cross libel shall be filed-

Without warrant for it. It would be a serious reflection upon the present administration of the Printing Office to say that they undertake to amend bills of the House when reported. When we get these copies of bills, I think we have a right to know whether they are correct or not. I obtained a copy of the bill and of the report, and it did not show that it was proposed to strike out section 2. I took the print of the bill which came in the ordinary course. I do not know how many prints there may have been since.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I think this is the last

Mr. MANN. The gentleman thinks so, but, then, we have no guaranty of that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. It is the one that is before the House now that we are called upon to act upon.

Mr. MANN. When a bill is reported, I do not know by what authority the clerks at the desk substitute another bill. I do not know where the clerks get authority, when a bill is reported to the desk, to substitute some other bill that somebody may bring to them.

Mr. HOWARD. May I ask the gentleman a question?
Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi, Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Was there not some finding of a maritime board on this case?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I think not. Mr. HOWARD. Was there no investigation made by any of the maritime authorities?

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. As far as I am informed, there was not. However, a suit has been instituted by the Government against this private company, and they simply ask the right to file a cross libel so that the whole matter may be determined in that one action.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "Commonwealth," insert the words "alleged to have been."

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "the," insert the word "alleged."

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "and," insert the word "cross."

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment:
Page 2, line 10, after the word "appeal," insert the words "Provided,
That said cross libel shall be filed not later than four months after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the following committee amendment:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi. I move that the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I presume that the Clerk will call up these bills reported by the Committee on Claims, in accordance with the ruling, and I call up House bill 3468. That is the

Mr. MANN. No; that is not the next bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the ruling which has been made, the Chair thinks the committees would have the right to alternate

Mr. POU. I beg the pardon of the Chair. The ruling of the previous occupant of the chair [Mr. ADAIR] was that on to-day bills from the Committee on Claims should be considered.

Mr. MANN. Number 19 on the Private Calendar is next.
Mr. POU. With the permission of the gentleman, I will explain that the previous occupant of the chair ruled that on next Friday the Committee on War Claims should have preference, but that on to-day bills reported by the Committee on Claims shall have preference. I made a mistake in the number of the next bill. I should have called up H. R. 7633.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair now understands that the gentleman's statement is correct. The Clerk will report the next bill on the calendar reported from the Committee on Claims.

CHARLES W. HAMMOND, DECEASED.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 7633) for the relief of the personal representative of Charles W. Hammond, deceased, as

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the personal representative of Charles W. Hammond, deceased, the sum of $68 for services in carrying the mail between Macon and Albany, Ga., in 1860 and 1861.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say with reference to this bill that while I was present at the meeting of the committee, I was called away just before the adjournment of the committee and before this matter was taken up. At the fol-lowing meeting of the committee another bill of like character was brought to the attention of the committee and a question arose as to what the precedents had been, and that led to some arose as to what the precedents had been, and that led to some investigation relative to the class of claims represented by this bill. This bill on its face represents a claim of the personal representatives of Charles W. Hammond for $68, but I find that it is but one of a very large class of claims and that there were some other bills of the same class, I do not know how many, pending. In the Claims Committee there is a list of these claims aggregating between $200,000 and $300,000. They grow out of the circumstances occurring shortly after the beginning of the late Civil War, when the postal service was abandoned in the South. As a result there are a great many hundreds, possibly thousands, of claims throughout the South of this character, all of which are apparently for small amounts, but which in the aggregate amount to between $200,000 and $300,000. These claims have been before Congress at different times during the last half century, and for some reason have not been acknowledged. Before the bill is passed I believe that the matter is of sufficient moment for the present Congress to hear and consider the reasons which controlled previous Congresses on this class of bills.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of my colleagues on the committee, I will ask that the bill be passed over for the present.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman mean until the next call?
Mr. POU. Yes; until the next claims day.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed over, without prejudice, until the next claims day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HEIRS OF SAMUEL H. DONALDSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3468) for the relief of the heirs of the late Samuel H. Don-

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and be hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs of the late Samuel H. Donaldson, who died from injuries received in the performance of his duties under the appraiser of merchandise at the port of New York, the sum of $5,000.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 8, strike out the figures "5,000" and insert the figures "1,500."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think that perhaps the policy of the committee and Congress ought to be established, in a way, with reference to this class of claims. This is a personal-injury claim on account of the death of an employee of the Government. The bill provided for $5,000, but the committee reports an amendment making it $1,500. May I ask my distinguished friend from North Carolina whether $1,500 is intended, in a way.

at least, as a year's salary?

Mr. POU. It is not.

Mr. MANN. Upon what theory does the committee fix the amount?

Mr. POU. On the theory, Mr. Chairman, that the committee heard the evidence and thought that $1,500 was a very moderate amount to pay the heirs or the personal representatives of this man, on account of death without any fault on his part.

I will say to the gentleman that the Committee on Claims has had up the same question which was discussed here during the We have decided that whatever may be the last Congress. opinion of individual gentlemen, so far as we are concerned we propose in the absence of a general law, to hear these cases, and wherever it appears that under similar circumstances a public service corporation would have been liable in damages, we propose to hold the Government liable. In other words, we have determined, and I think I can speak for the entire committee, both Republicans and Democrats, because I am glad to say there never has been any politics in any way in the committee since I have been chairman-we have decided that it is not fair or just for the Government to hide behind its sovereignty when a public-service corporation would have been liable under a given statement of facts.

Now, we have gone further than that, and I think we ought to be sustained by the House; we have said that wherever it appears that an employee of the Government loses his life or is injured without any negligence whatever on his part, the Government should allow reasonable compensation, and if the policy of this country has not reached the point of making public-service corporations liable in such cases, I believe the day is near at hand when it will.

Here is a typical case. Here is a laborer who was getting perhaps $3 a day—for the moment I do not recollect how much—who, without any fault on his part, in the discharge of his duties lost his life. He had several little children dependent upon him. He had a wife at the time who has since died, largely, it was believed, on account of the shock that was inflicted upon her by reason of his sudden death. Here is a man who loses his all without any fault on his part. It would not be right to appraise the amount that the Government would pay him in accordance with the daily wages he was receiving.

The Committee on Claims said it believed the House would sustain us in this position. We think there ought to be a general law, but, in the absence of a general law, so long as we are forced to consider these cases we propose to do what is just and right. Here is a man, without any fault on his part, loses his life, and we say $1,500 is not only not too much but it is, perhaps, not as great an amount as the family ought to have under the circumstances.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. POU. Certainly.
Mr. COX. Did not the House pass a bill in the last Congress giving a lady $8,000 who got injured down here in the Census Office?

Mr. POU. The House did. The House passed a bill giving a woman $8,000 because, without any fault on her part, she had the scalp torn from her head; and I will say to my friend that this country is waking up upon this subject, and ought to wake up; and the Committee on Claims can do no better service, in my humble judgment, than to report these bills and thereby emphasize the necessity for a general law.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. How does the Committee on Claims make the basis for paying these claims?

Mr. POU. There is no basis, except to give what we think a jury would probably assess in the same circumstances.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. There is no particular.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. There is no particular standard?

Mr. POU. No. I can not explain the basis upon which the committee acts in any better way than to repeat, we are trying to do what we believe to be fair and right. I will say just one thing more and then sit down, with the gentleman's permission. Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman from North Carolina proceeding in my time.

Mr. POU. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] that we may as well have an understanding about this matter here and now, and I am sorry there is not a larger attendance of the House present. We have a number of these bills. There are others coming in, and I make the prediction-I have no authority to speak for the entire committee that in every instance where it appears that a laborer, an employee, a servant of the Government, was injured or lost his life without any fault on his own part we shall put the bill on the calendar with a favorable report. Whether you gentlemen will sustain us we do not know, but we are going to put that proposition up to you in the hope that in the course of time a general law may be passed to cover all of these cases and relieve the Committee on Claims from the necessity of their consideration.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I did not hear the first part of the gentleman's statement, but to guide me in preparing for the considera-tion of the committee certain cases I have in mind I will ask the gentleman if the committee has fixed a rate of compensation in such cases?

Mr. POU. No; we have not. We have no rule to go by except this: We hear the evidence, constitute ourselves in the nature of a jury, and recommend to the House that it pay a fair and just amount.

Mr. LANGLEY. The annual compensation an employee might have been receiving will not control the committee then?

Mr. POU. Of course, that enters as an element into our consideration, but I will say to the gentleman that there are cases in which the family of a man who receives $2 a day or $3 a day and who loses his life ought to get more than the family of a man who was worth a large amount of money.

Mr. LANGLEY. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman in

Mr. POU. We do not propose to be governed by the compensation of the laborer or employee, because, take, for instance, the case of a man who is worth $100,000 who loses his life. In that case his family would receive probably 5 per cent on the amount of money he was worth, or an income of, say, $5,000. Then take the case of another man who gets three or four dol-He loses his life and his family may be deprived.

lars a day. He loses his life and his family may be deprived.

Mr. LANGLEY. I have a case in mind where a deputy marshal was killed in my district-killed in the line of duty, without fault on his part. He leaves a widow and several small children, and they are practically destitute; and, if I can, I want to get at the idea of the committee as to the compensation in such a case, where the family is left in that condition. Also, what is the rule where such a deputy is permanently in-jured, in the same circumstances? I have a case of that kind

Mr. POU. I can only state to the gentleman that I have answered before that the committee has no hard and fast rule, and I do not think it will adopt any. We merely bring in reports which we think as nearly respond to the principles of equity and right in a given statement of facts as possible.

Mr. COX. And let each case stand or fall upon its own

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. Mr. Chairman, does the gentle-man think that a general law would be desirable, at least on the general principles of a workingmen's compensation law?

Mr. POU. I do not believe that a general law can be worked out in equity that is dependent upon the wages a man receives. That is the point I am protesting against, because there are cases where a man gets nothing at all, where his family ought to get more than the family of a man of means. But I am saying that the Committee on Claims has a tremendous task. We shrink from it when we see the number of bills, but we propose to do the best we can until Congress in its wisdom sees fit to appoint some agency which will determine these matters in controversy or provide some general compensation act applying to employees of the Government.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. POU. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] has the

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, up to within a few years ago it had not been the policy of the Government of the United States, or in most instances, at least, the policy of the various States, to pay compensation for personal injuries in any case. Of course, occasionally there was a variation from that policy, as in the case of the United States in the Ford Theater disaster of some years ago. Congress in that case did make provision for the payment of compensation on account of death and in-jury there. It never had been the policy of the Committee on Claims prior, I believe, to the Sixty-first Congress, or possibly the Sixtieth Congress, to report any bills making any compensation for the personal injury of Government employees or of other persons who were injured through the negligence of Government employees or officials. In the Sixtieth or the Sixtyfirst Congress, or possibly earlier, we passed a bill making compensation in certain hazardous employments of the Government, fixing the limit of one year's pay for persons who were injured in the service where the injury lasted during the course of a year, and making compensation for an amount of pay due to a person where the injury lasted over 15 days. That was a distinct departure from the hitherto policy of the Government, along the more modern ideas of humane treatment.

I take it that the reason the Government in the first instance did not undertake to make itself liable for personal injuries was because in trying a case before a jury or a court, or, I might add, before this distinguished body of Representatives, the Government as a rule does not have much chance against the sympathy plea of somebody who has been injured or of survivors of somebody who has been killed in the Government service.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FOU. Take this case, for instance-

Mr. MANN. I shall discuss this case later.
Mr. POU. I was merely wanting to ask the gentleman if he thinks we made an error in giving this man $1,500?

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman I do not. I am not complaining about the action of the committee in this case at all.

Then, after we had passed this general law, which applied only to certain hazardous occupations, we extended the general law to several additional hazardous occupations, always confining the total amount, or the upset amount, to one year's salary. I do not say that that is a just method for arriving at compensation. It was a method, and indicated the desire of the Government to do something along those lines. Following that, the Committee on Claims in the next Congress, I think, succeeding the passage of this general law, reported in bills for employees engaged in the same hazardous occupations who had been injured before the law was passed, because the law applied only to those who were injured thereafter, but in each case confining their report to what would have been allowed under the general law if the person had been injured after the passage of the general law, the upset amount being one year's salary. In a very short time the Committee on Claims, moved by sympathetic and humane motives, concluded that one year's salary for some of these people was not enough, and so they reported more than one year's salary. Then the Committee on Claims was enabled to distinguish, where a man had actually Then the Committee on been killed, between a hazardous occupation and one which was not hazardous, because they took the theory that if the man was killed, in his case, at least, the occupation was hazardous. And they went outside of the classes provided under the general law and commenced to appropriate the same amount that would have been given to the person if the person had been injured in a hazardous occupation. Then they soon increased the amount.

I am not complaining, gentlemen, understand. we had a commission appointed in reference to compensation of employees of the interstate transportation interests. They made a report recommending the passage of the bill, which, as I understand now, is probably as near defunct as perhaps legislation can get. Following that, the Committee on the Judiciary had some one of their members prepare a bill, which I think was first introduced by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. Sterling], then a Member of the House, which made compensation along the same lines for Government employees that had been recommended by the commission for employees of the railroad.

I noticed the other day with pleasure that the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary-unless I am mistaken-reintroduced that bill, or at least introduced a bill, for the purpose of making compensation to Government employees generally. I quite agree with the proposition that we have reached that stage where, whether it is desirable to stop it or not, you can not stop it. From my own standpoint I do not think it is desirable.

The other day we incorporated into the Post Office appropriation bill, with some parliamentary skill, a proposition, which remained in, to pay postal employees up to the limit of $2.000 for death or a year and a half salary for injury, if the injury lasted that long.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. Mr. BARTLETT. We had prior to that time a law which paid the railway postal clerks $2,000.

Mr. MANN. We had prior to that time a law which paid the postal clerks $2,000. It was made $2,000 on my motion. It was $1.000, and one day in the House I made a motion to amend by making it $2,000, and nobody voted against it, I believe. It might properly be made more.

Now, I do not know how the Committee on Claims reached the amount it recommends, except as stated by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. Pou]. The amount in this case is not exorbitant, being $1,500, but it is quite evident that the procedure indicated by my friend from North Carolina [Mr. Pou] was hardly followed in this case. What did they have before them? A few statements from people who were not Government officials. The Government side of the case was not heard at all. There was no presentation by anybody in behalf of the Government against the allowance of the claim or as to the amount that should be allowed, and this distinguished committee only followed the report that had been made by a prior distinguished Committee on Claims.

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman that in every instance the Committee on Claims inquires of the department whether it has any facts, and if the department can give us any information we act upon that information.

Mr. MANN. I will say to my distinguished friend from North Carolina of course I do not know what information the committee had. All I can judge from is the information the committee reports to the House. In this case the committee reports to the House that it recommends the passage of the bill and adopts a report made in the last Congress. And all the information-and they point to a number of statements-all the information in the report which was made in the last Congress is from parties interested, or from a police official, or something of that sort, in New York City, with no statement at all on behalf of anybody representing the Government, and no report called for from the Treasury Department as to the facts alleged by the claimant in this case.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman knows that in England they have a compensation act covering all Government employees and all employees in the various corporations?

Mr. MANN. I am not familiar with it, but if the gentleman makes that statement about it I will accept it.

Mr. BARTLETT. There was such an act passed by the English Parliament, which provides for payment of employees who are injured, both in the Government service and in various corporations outside of the Government.

I want to call attention to that for the purpose of saying that that act fixes the compensation to injured employees, or employees who are killed, along the line that has heretofore been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, fixing the risk to those engaged in hazardous employment. It seems that the act that did not pass the House last Congress, known as the workmen's compensation act, relating to employment on railroads, fixed it along the line of what the man was receiving, both as to compensation for his injuries and compensation to his family if he was killed, or to those dependent upon him.

Mr. MANN. As I recall the workmen's compensation act, it does not base the amount so much on what he is receiving as on what the injuries were that he received.

Mr. BARTLETT. In case of death the compensation was fixed at one-half of what he was receiving, which was paid for That is true.

Mr. MANN. I thought in case of death a certain amount was provided to be paid to those dependent on the deceased for a series of years.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes. One-half of what the deceased had been receiving was to be paid to his dependents for a term of four years. The maximum was $100 a month, I believe, and the minimum $50.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. And it was provided that the money should not be paid to the families of the deceased unless they were dependent and the children were under 16 years

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. DIES. They also have an old-age pension system in England, have they not?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and a service pension also. Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to detain the committee, but I want to call attention to another proposition in reference to this subject. I recently introduced a bill to provide for payment of some amount to a letter carrier who was injured in the Postal Service. I do not know whether he should receive anything or not. I asked the distinguished chairman of the committee to refer that bill to the Post Office Department for information, which he most courteously did. The Post Office Department reported no information at all on the bill and made no investigation of the facts alleged in the bill or in reference to the injury which was alleged to have occurred, but reported that they did not believe the bill ought to pass, because they were opposed to these personal bills and thought that there should be general legislation.

Well, I agree with the Post Office Department in that respect—that it is more desirable to have general legislation than to have personal legislation, although I fail to distinguish between this case or other cases where there is personal legislation and the bill which I introduced, so far as personal legislation is concerned, because I apprehend that Congress will not pass a law allowing compensation for injuries which have already occurred.

I would like to ask my dir inguished friend, the chairman of this committee [Mr. Pou], without endeavoring to commit him in any way whatever, whether he thinks that a postal employee who may be injured in the service or who may be injured in the service before a law passes giving compensation generally is to be barred because the Post Office Department thinks there ought to be general legislation instead of personal legislation, while the employees of the Treasury Department are to be paid compensation in case of personal injury by personal bills?

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I do not hesitate at all to answer the gentleman. The committee does not act upon the recommendation of the department at all. The recommendation of the department is merely advisory, and I can see no reason for any distinction or discrimination. I will say to the gentleman that I have no doubt that the bill which he has introduced will have fair consideration-

Mr. MANN. I know that-

Mr. POU. And if the facts justify there will be an early and favorable report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, personally I believe that the liability act that we have is not a fair one. It was, it is true, a step of progress when enacted. But I do not think a year's pay, especially for a laboring man who is killed in the Government service through no negligence of his, who leaves perhaps a widow and small children, is a sufficient compensation if we are to make any compensation at all. [Applause.]

I am glad to know that in this bill it is not provided that this man's children shall be paid so much as "compensation" death. I remember seeing bills discussed here where the bills provided that some widows or children should be paid $300 " for compensation" for the death of their husbands and fathers.

Well, that was a form, but it was a bad form.

Mr. BARTLETT. It happened to be a legal form. That is what the law calls it in a suit between an employee and an employer.

Mr. MANN. I understand; and I believe we should pay more, and I believe we ought to pass something in the nature of the Clayton bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. This is true, that all amounts not paid as compensation must be paid out as gratuities by a generous Government.

Mr. MANN. Yes. This is a generous gratuity.
Mr. BARTLETT. That is it.
Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, in this connection I desire to make just a few observations, based upon my experience since I have been a Member of this House.

I never was more thoroughly convinced in my life than I am at this stage of my experience in this House that there ought to be some general legislation to relieve Congress from the consideration of bills of this class. In the first place, it takes up a very great amount of the time of Congress to pass them, and in the second place there is not one person out of one hundred, usually, who is injured who knows the course of procedure he should take to get compensation for any injury that he may incur while in the employ of the Government without any fault

Further than that, I have another objection to legislation of this sort, and it is the manner of arriving at the amount of compensation to be paid. As has been suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the Government's side, as a rule, is not heard, and probably those who furnish the evidence upon which the Committee on Claims acts have furnished biased evidence; that is, they have sympathy with the wife or children of the deceased employee of the Government. These statements are not made under oath. They are not verified in any way, except that the chairman of the committee very properly refers a particular claim, when some Member introduces it, to the department, and that department in turn reports to the committee its approval or disapproval of the claim.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for just a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. DIES. Do I understand the gentleman's position to be that he would subscribe to a general law embracing all the employees of the Government and providing compensation to all injured employees of the Government, or their beneficiaries in case of death, or that he objects to a particular class of claims? Would he exclude a portion of the Government employees or would be embrace them all in a general law?

Mr. HOWARD. My idea is that all injured employees of the Government ought to be put upon the same basis with the employees of any private corporation in this respect, that if the injured employee did not contribute to the accident by his own negligence, he ought to have a court that he can go into, whether he is working for the Government or not; he ought to have a court to which he can go, where he can establish his claim in a regular way by the submission of the sworn testimony of himself and his witnesses, and where the Government itself can go with like evidence and be heard.

Mr. DIES. Would my colleague have that court given jurisdiction to decree final judgment against the Government in the case he mentions?

Mr. HOWARD. I should not see any objection to it. If we can not get a court of that character, that would mete out equal and exact justice, then our whole judicial system is wrong, because thousands of the claims of the people are being passed on daily by the courts that have competent jurisdiction.

Mr. DIES. Considering the slight sympathy we find here on the part of this body for the Treasury of the United States, what sized verdicts do you think would be rendered down in Georgia against the Government of the United States in favor of men who were injured?

Mr. HOWARD. I will say that I have seen just as outrageous verdicts rendered against certain public utility corporations in my experience as a lawyer, as I could ever hope to see rendered against the Government of the United States.

Now, the question of determining the value of a man's life is arrived at in a certain way by the courts of this country. They take the age at which he was injured and his earning capacity, and from those they compute what his life would be worth and reduce it to a cash basis, and they predicate the judgment, after the rendition of the verdict of the jury, upon evidence of a competent character to show the value of that man's life. Now, this committee in this particular case have rendered a decision in which they say that the children of the deceased are entitled to recover $1,500. In glancing at the facts in this case I notice that this man was 34 years old. earning as much as $2 a day the payment of $1,500 to these little orphan children, one 4 years old, one 7, one 9, and the other one 12, is not adequate compensation for the loss of the life of their father, which occurred without any fault of his.

The Government of the United States should not be niggardly with its employees when they are killed in the discharge of their duty, and it ought not to be niggardly, but it ought to treat them just as the courts of the country would treat them if they were working for private corporations.

Mr. Chairman, I will give the chairman of the committee the benefit of a case within my own knowledge. There is a gentleman working in the Atlanta post office, a splendid man, who has spent 20 years in the service of the Government. He got into an elevator in the post-office building. That elevator was being run by a negro who was addicted to the use of cocaine. He was very much under the influence of that drug, but this old man did not know there was anything the matter with him. He got in the elevator, and the negro started it before he could get in, and as a result he was caught and had his hip crushed, his leg broken, and without any fault on the part of that old man he suffered this injury and the loss of his salary for nearly 18 months.

Mr. DIES. What does the gentleman from Georgia think would have been a suitable verdict in that case?

Mr. HOWARD. He was about 56 years old when he was hurt, and I will say to the gentleman that if he should come in contact with a railroad engine in my State at a public crossing and should be similarly injured, I should consider myself licked in the trial of that case if I did not get him at least $6,000 or $7,000 verdict. Yet the Government of the United States not only refused to pay that faithful old employee his salary, which amounted to less than $100 a month, during the 18 months that he was lying upon a bed of pain and suffering, but to this good hour he has not recovered a cent from the Government. could he recover? He could not recover unless he had some Member of Congress close enough to him to take an interest in him, to introduce a bill for him and work for it before the Committee on Claims and present his case,

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Is it not a fact that most of these parties who bring claims against the Government bring them through attorneys, and that the attorneys receive a portion of the amount that is voted by Congress?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know about that.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. In a case like this, if the amount recommended for this man Denaldson, $1,500, is agreed to, is it not fair to assume that a certain portion of it is going to the attorneys, and that his family will not receive all of that amount, and is not that one reason why this amount of $1,500 is not excessive?

Mr. HOWARD. I do not consider the amount excessive. In fact, I am talking about the proposition that it is not enough, if he is entitled to anything. I do not know about the practice lawyers representing claims before the Committee on

Mr. POU. I will say to my friend from Georgia that there are very few of these personal injury cases in which there is any lawyer involved. We usually work up these matters ourselves, and I may say that I do not believe any lawyer appears before us or has anything to do with these claims in 15 per cent of the cases.

Mr. LANGLEY. It is not necessary that they should appear, is it?

Mr. POU. Of course, we do not need the help of lawyers. Mr. HOWARD. Oh, lawyers need no defense with me. Mr. POU.

believe that the lawyers do more good in this world than any other class of men on earth, except the preacher. [Applause and laughter.] Some folks who are not lawyers might not believe that; but, as a matter of fact, I doubt very seriously whether there is a lawyer upon this floor who would in the least doubt that statement.

Mr. LANGLEY. We admit it. Mr. ESCH. They admit it.

Mr. LOBECK. They must hang together, or they might hang separately. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. I do not know about hanging together, but sometimes we fail to hang some fellow that ought to be hanged. The gentleman asked me whether the lawyers might not get in, if we established a court of some sort for the consideration of these claims. There ought to be some sort of a court that would be open to claimants of this character, so that it would be advertised to the world that if you are injured in the service of the Government in the discharge of your duties you can go to some tribunal and get justice. And it ought not to be dependent upon your personal acquaintance or your influence with your Congressman or your Senator. Now, there is this old man that I spoke of a moment ago-

Mr. DIES. I want to know if my friend from Georgia would include the employees of the Army and Navy, soldiers in the line and sailors in the Navy?

Mr. HOWARD. Why, my good friend, they have already been embraced. If you look at this pension bill that is com-

Mr. DIES. I am talking about those who are serving in the Army and Navy at the present time. Would you embrace those also as Government employees?

Mr. HOWARD. Why, Mr. Chairman, they are all taken care of. There is no man in the service of this Government in the Army or the Navy who, if he were killed to-day in the line of duty, somebody would not get paid for his life more than these poor children of this man Donaldson are getting from this bill.

Will the gentleman yield? Mr. DIES.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. DIES. I am afraid my friend does not comprehend my question. He would have this court established to have the cases tried before a jury where the accident occurred, rendering the verdicts against the Government on behalf of the employee. Would he have that embrace the soldiers of the Army and the sailors of the Navy?

Mr. HOWARD. No; I would not have it embrace the military or naval forces at all. It ought not to do it.

Mr. SISSON. Why not?

Mr. HOWARD. Because the disability of a soldier or a sailor and all such claims ought to be passed on by the War and Navy Departments, because they would be in a better position to know the record of that particular soldier or sailor than anybody else.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I suppose the gentleman is aware that there are now pending one or more bills before the House for a general compensation act for Government employees, and on the scale of a similar compensation act that was introduced for the benefit of the railway employees.

Mr. HOWARD. I am glad to know that there is to be some sort of compensation law for this class of Government employees. But in the last Congress, with 30 minutes' debate, with not more than 10 Members of this great body ever reading one line of the bill, an employees' compensation act was rammed one line of the bill, an employees' compensation act was raimled through this House that took the right of trial by jury from 3,000,000 American citizens, without an elective clause in it where they could have determined their cases by trial by jury.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield once more?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. DIES. Along with this compensation proposition for injury to Government employees is another proposition to pension all the aged employees of the Government, those who are no longer strong enough to render the service for which they are employed. Is my friend prepared to subscribe to pensions for decrepit Government servants?

Mr. HOWARD. Not as long as I retain my present weak entality. I will never vote for that kind of a law.

Mr. DIES. Does the gentleman think as a matter of gratuity and sympathy the Government should pay the employees injured in its service? If he does, why would he not be willing to pay the faithful employee, who has grown old in the service and can no longer serve the Government, something to retire upon in his old age?

Mr. HOWARD. The two propositions are different. In one you teach the Government employee who goes into the service or you say to him, "Have all the pleasure you can while in the service, you are young and active, spend all your money and throw it away, do not practice frugality and when you get old, although we have given you a good salary all your life because you have worked for the Government we will put you in a different position than any other people who pay taxes. We will give you enough to live on in your old age."

I think it would be the worst example that could be set on the face of the earth to let these civil-service employees of the Government understand that when they are decrepit and too old to follow work for the Government that they should receive a pension for the balance of their days.

But, I am in favor of this and I would vote for it to-day if I had the opportunity, and I would go back to my people with absolute certainty that they would approve it. I would, so far as I could, equalize the salaries of the Government employees and give them a salary that they could live on. I would not predicate their promotion in these departments upon the influence of some United States Senator or some Congressman to have him promoted over some man who had a better record because the other fellow did not have any influence. That is being done every day and Members know it.

But that is beside the question. The question I rose to address myself to the House upon was the method of procedure in the collection of damages against the Government of the United States for personal injuries where the employee is involved. I concur with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Green] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann] that there ought to be some legislation of some sort where these injured employees can go and adjust their claims against the Government, just as they could if they were injured by a private corporation.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not know where the legislation along this line is going to end. But I draw a line of distinction between the citizen working for a private corpora-tion and one working for the Government. I do not believe it should permit the Federal Government to select out a class that happens to be fortunate enough to get their names on the pay roll and when they are injured pension them or their family, or when they die in the service or grow old in the service that they are to receive from the balance of the people of the Nation a part of what they, the taxpayers, earn. For this reason, if these men in this class are entitled to this favor at the hands of the Government, performing some service directly for the Government and paid for directly out of the Treasury, they are performing no more necessary, useful, or essential function for the existence of the Government than is the man working in private life, working on the farm or in the factory or in the mine. There is no reason why you should make officeholders a favored class and should pay them when unfortunate and not pay the man on the farm or in the factory or in the mine and all the civil pursuits of life.

Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. POU. That is the very reason why it is contended by the committee that these claims ought to be paid. A man working in the mine or in the factory who is hurt has a right of action against the mine or factory owner, whereas the Gov-ernment hides itself behind its sovereignty and says because it can not be sued, no matter how the man was injured, he shall not have anything. That is the thing which the Committee on Claims says is not right.

Mr. SISSON. There is a distinction between a man working for a corporation or for an individual and for a man working for the Government, for this reason: The Government must exist and exist only through its agents, who only assume duties devolving upon them by law. The officeholder is not a master of those under him and the doctrine of master and servant can not apply. The officeholder, from President down to the lowest official, is nothing more or less than an employee of the Government of the United States, an employee of the masses of the people, doing only those things required of him by law to do. He can not direct his course; he can not direct his conduct; he can not be in any way responsible for the methods that the officeholder may pursue. But in civil life the laborer does the work imposed upon him by order of his employer who is solely responsible for these orders and the condition of the tools, appliances, and machinery used by the laborer. In the Government certain duties set out in the statute are performed with the full knowledge of what those duties are, and the employee of the Government assumes all the risks of that employment.

The doctrine of negligence can not be imputed and never has been imputed to the whole people, because the whole people may not respond in damages; but a man who controls his own private business, who has the direction of it and the employment of men under it, has the opportunity to provide safe machinery and safe places for his men to work. That involves a different proposition from all of the people of the United States, who can not and ought not to be put in a position where they themselves will respond to the negligence of the officeholder over whom they themselves can have no control and direction.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. What is the Government of the United States, if it is not a gigantic corporation, with a hundred million stockholders?

Mr. SISSON. There is a great deal of difference between a corporation which is, in a sense, the agent of the people in a governmental capacity and a corporation organized by virtue of the law of the sovereign for the purpose of transacting business in a certain way and for the purpose of profit. The Government can impose conditions on the corporation, can impose conditions on men engaged in business, and can require that in doing this line of business for profit you must assume certain obligations. If the Government officials should provide an unsafe building or an unsafe elevator, and a latent defect was unknown to the employee, there might be some equity in the unknown to the employee, there might be some equity in the Government responding in damages if the employee was injured without negligence on his own part. But the great trouble is that the responsibility of the official is such that you can not punish him, because he loses no money by his own carelessness; it simply comes out of the people. When a man owns lessness; it simply comes out of the people. When a man owns stock in a corporation he himself is punished, because he suffers financial loss, and it is in the nature of a punishment administered to him in order that he shall properly conduct his business. But here in this case the official of the Government has no responsibility of that kind attaching to him. He suffers no financial loss, and there is no inducement to him to be as careful as he would be in the case of a man owning stock in a corporation and electing officials to make money.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman contend that a corporation is not liable in damages because of the negligence of an

Mr. SISSON. Absolutely, because the corporation also has to do business; but the stockholder himself must be responsible for his agents, and then the stockholder himself loses money by it; but a Government official himself does not lose anything by carelessness; it comes out of the taxpayer. The official is not interested in the corporation in a financial way.

Mr. HOWARD. Does the gentleman contend that if your agent—and he is the agent of the gentleman, and he is my agent, and the agent of every citizen of this country-is negligent, so negligent that he causes the death or the injury of an employee—does the gentleman contend that then the Govern-ment of the United States ought not to pay to the employee an adequate compensation for an injury caused by the negligence of the agent of the Government?

Mr. SISSON. But the gentleman has two propositions entirely mixed. The gentleman has me, a person, mixed with the Government.

Mr. HOWARD. But the gentleman is a stockholder in the Government.

Mr. SISSON, Oh, I am no stockholder in the Government in any sense of the word.

Mr. HOWARD. But the gentleman is obliged to be a stockholder.

Mr. SISSON. There is no such thing as stock in a Government. That is the great trouble about the whole proposition. Men get confused with such comparison, for government is not established for profit, but for the good of the people.

Mr. HOWARD. The capital stock of this Government is the amount of taxes levied on the people. That is the capital stock, and the gentleman contributes toward that, and that makes him a stockholder

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman is mistaken. As a matter of fact, there is no such thing as stock in a government. This tax is a contribution or burden imposed upon a citizen and never pays a dividend, but takes from the citizen a part of what he earns to support the Government. There is no such thing as a man having property value in a government. The Government itself does not own a cent or a penny of property, except what it takes from the people. The only thing that the Government owns is what it takes away from the people. Even the public land belongs to all of the people. The Government is made up of servants who perform certain duties imposed upon them by law. You have an agent in the White House and agents in this House and agents over there at the other end of the Capitol and agents on the Supreme Court bench. Those three different branches constitute the Government of the

Mr. HOWARD. The distinguished citizen in the White House is the President of the corporation, and we are the board of directors. There is no trouble about that. It is a completely organized corporation.

Mr. DIES. But the gentleman is bound to admit that it is not a corporation for profit.

Mr. HOWARD. Not at all. It is a corporation usually for loss, but your profit and my profit in this great governmental corporation is the protection afforded me by it as a citizen and the blessings I enjoy by virtue of that citizenship.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield further.

Mr. HOWARD. But the gentleman has an hour. Mr. SISSON. But I do not want to consume the hour. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Howard] is entirely wrong in assuming that the Federal Government and the people in their sovereign capacity ever can occupy the same relation to its employees that a corporation does to its employees, because the officials of the Government are not in the nature of a board of directors. They are servants performing duties imposed by law. They are the people who are controlling the Government and administering the laws of the Government.

The employee himself, to a certain extent, is just as much an agent of the Government, having certain duties develving on him, as is the President of the United States. You may as well say that the President of the United States, if he is injured in the line of duty, shall be paid because of the fact that he occupies a position as an official, and yet the man who directs a corporation, the man who controls the institution for a private corporation, he himself directing the movement, is not guilty and can not be guilty of such acts as would cause the corporation to be liable to him, because he assumes the responsibility of management and control, and on the doctrine of liability the man who controls another man, who directs another man, who himself controls the movements of another, and the place where he shall work—because of the fact that he is permitted to have this right—we say you ought to be responsible in damages if you are negligent and cause an injury. This hurts him, and it makes him more careful. It makes him provide good, safe places for the men to work. But with the Federal Government you have an entirely different proposition, because the Federal Government can act only through its agents. It acts only through those men who are elected to office, and then the Government itself ought not to be in a position where it shall be controlled under exactly the same conditions as a business institution is. The old adage that "the King can do no wrong" finds lodgment in this principle. In America the whole people can do no wrong. You can not impute negligence to it. You may impute negligence to the officials as persons. You may sue them, but you can not impute their negligence to all the people.

I do not want to put the Government in the same class with business institutions, and let the taxpayers of this country be submitted to judgments of all kind and character that may be obtained. But if you do; if you shall ever hold that a man doing service for the Government shall have the right to go into a court and recover from the balance of the taxpayers who are not so fortunate as to be connected with the pay roll, then you must do as they have done in England and other free countries, go a step further and include every man performing his duty in private life, because he is just as much a part of the Government and as essential to the existence of the Government as the man who holds a seat in Congress. If you admit that the Government should respond in damages to its employees, then it must follow, as the night the day, that the Government must assume a further duty of taking care of the old and infirm. And it is an unfair proposition to say to all the people of America who are not connected with the pay roll of the Federal Government that if a man should be aged while he is holding an office, they shall be further taxed for the purpose of paying him when he gets old, paying him when he is injured, when he himself is perhaps absolutely the cause of his injury. man is fortunate to be able to hold office so long. He ought to save his salary and prepare for a rainy day. You are not to save his salary and prepare for a rainy day. You are not going to be able to get through this House a bill that will say that a Government employee must be negligent before he can recover. You try it. You will find these Members of Congress who favor this pension system and the payment as a lump sum to the employees, when they find they are going to be able to control the legislation, will never pass a bill that will put the Government on the same basis as a private corporation. You are not going to be able to get it through, because they will abolish the negligence feature entirely and pay the employee whether negligent or not.

Mr. DIES. Does not my friend from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson] think it will be about as fair, in fact fairer, to take up a collection by taxation among the officeholders to give a sum of money to a farmer or laborer who is hurt trying to pay the taxes, as it would be to take up a general collection among the taxpayers to pay an officeholder who is hurt?

Mr. SISSON. I think the illustration used by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies] is very apt, and I am willing to adopt it in all its breadth and thickness.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield? Mr. SISSON. I will. Mr. MANN. My distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. Dies injects a very pertinent observation. He is apparently against the bill, but I believe he is a member of the committee that reported it.

Mr. DIES. I will say to my friend from Illinois that I am only discussing the general principle of compensation for employees and compensation for job holders.

Mr. MANN. Trying to get away from the abstract to the concrete, I would like to hear my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. Dies], who is opposed to pensioning or paying compensation in any case, give the reason why he is in favor of giving it in this case?

Mr. SISSON. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia

[Mr. Howard].

Mr. HOWARD. I was following with a great deal of in-Mr. HOWARD. I was following with a great deal of interest your statement of what you think about paying the claims against the Government. Now, the great body at the other end of this Capitol just passed a bill providing that the Government shall go into the railroad business by constructing railroads throughout Alaska. By another bill they are going to buy the telegraph and telephone lines. I am not saying whether they ought to do so or not, but do you think if a man should be driving some reindeer up in Alaska, and without being given any warning an Alaskan government railroad engine should hit his sleigh and kill him and injure his reindeer and empty out his coal-

Mr. SISSON. Empty out his ice. [Laughter.]
Mr. HOWARD. Or his ice; that the Government ought not to pay for that negligence of the engineer on that Government

Mr. SISSON. Now, when the Government of the United States goes into business, when it assumes the function of managing private business, and assumes to do the things that private corporations do, then it will follow, of course, as the night the day, that they will have to assume the burdens which the corporations assume. But that is an entirely different proposition.

Now, you take, for example, the construction of the Panama anal. Down there, for certain amounts, the officials and officers of the Panama Canal were authorized to settle claims where employees were injured, and frequently the settlement was made without going into the question of negligence of the employee. If it is a great amount, if it involves the death of the party, they generally go into an examination of the negligence, of his past, and what he was doing at the time of the accident. Up to a certain amount they have settled those claims, and Col. Goethals relieved Congress and the courts of all that burden. Now, the Government did that because when it goes into business, when it goes to take up the railroad and telegraph lines, and all this dangerous business, then it must assume the burdens that private business bears. ernment now, having its officials performing nothing but the official duties devolving upon them, is in an entirely different class from those employed to manage a railway.

Mr. HOWARD. Sappose we take a man who is killed by a parcel-post package falling on him and fracturing his skull. The express companies and these other corporations are in the same business. Do you maintain that if they could recover from an express company the value of his life they ought not to recover the value of his life from the Government?

Mr. SISSON. I will say, no; if the man himself was managing the parcel-post package which fell on his head, they ought not to pay a cent. But I stated a moment ago that when the Government is going into all lines of business, as it looks like it will do, then it becomes a business institution, and it may not be far distant when they will be manufacturing all the wool, and all the iron and steel, and doing everything that the citizen is now doing; and when it does, and enjoys all the profits of that business, they provide for all the people, and the Government of the United States should respond in damages because it is in business for the profit of the people.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Right in that connection will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois

[Mr. MADDEN]

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the gentleman from Mississippi recalls the fact that only a week or two ago the House passed the Post Office appropriation bill, in which was included a proviso for the payment of $2,000 if any person employed in the Postal Service should be unfortunate enough to lose his life while serving in the line of duty, and providing for the payment of his salary at full rate for one year and at half rate for the second year to any employee of the Post Office Department who was unfortunate enough to be injured so as to prevent him from being able to continue to do his duty. Does the gentleman remember that?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I remember that; but because that happens to be an item in one of the bills passed by the House it does not necessarily follow that I agree to it. It does not follow that I agree with everything that passes this House. I would hate to assume responsibility for everything that goes through both Houses of Congress during a session. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. But the gentleman voted for that bill, did he not?

he not?

Mr. SISSON. Yes; I voted for the entire bill. I do not know whether there was a roll call on it or not.

Mr. BRYAN. There was a roll call on the bill. Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Now, speaking with reference to claims, the gentleman and I have many constituents interested in southern war claims, for cotton destroyed and taken, and so forth. Now, what in the world is the necessity for this Congress to be burdened with passing a bill to refer such claims to the Court of Claims when, after the Court of Claims has adjudicated it and has reported it to Congress, Congress refuses to put it into an appropriation bill or refuses to pass the bill when it has been put in?

What has that to do with this proposition? Mr. HOWARD. I am asking you what is your opinion. Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman ask the question?

Mr. HOWARD. I am asking you now whether you do not think it a foolish procedure to attempt to collect a claim against this Government in that way?

Mr. SISSON. Now, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Howard] as to cotton claims and anything else by virtue of which any people furnish anything to the Government, that is a different proposition from the proposition of pensioning old age and giving pensions or gratuities to those people who incur damages.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman will excuse me. I do not think he understands the purport of my question. I asked if he did not think it was a foolish procedure that all of this red tape had to be gone through with before one of his constituents or my constituents could get justice at the hands of Congressin the first place referring a bill to the Court of Claims and

Mr. SISSON. I do not think it is foolish, because I do not wish to pass judgment upon Members of Congress in the Senate and in the House, past and present, and say that they are fool- | the work. How would you handle those old men?

That would be equivalent to saying that the majority of the Members of the Senate and the majority of the Members of the House are fools, and I do not think that that is so at all. I do not think it is foolish in any sense of the word. I only say that Congress in its wisdom saw fit to take up each of these items one at a time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri. Mr. DYER. I understand the gentleman is opposed to this

Mr. SISSON. I am opposed to the principle involved in this bill. I want to be frank with the gentleman and with the House. As long as we are paying claims of this class to other people, as long as others are being paid, I am not singling out this particular claim or opposing it. I am not opposing that. I am simply opposed to the general proposition to which this legislation is gradually leading, and it will certainly follow that when you pension all of these people—and I use the word "pour the proposition of the second transfer of "pension" to cover the gratuities that you pay—when you pass a general law it will follow that the taxpayers, who are paying the salaries of the Members of Congress and the employees of the Government are going to demand that they be treated like all other citizens are treated. They are not going to permit you to select out the office-holding class—Government officials, civilservice employees-and pension them when they are injured in the performance of their duty, while at the same time the private citizen is not pensioned when he is injured. That is what I am afraid of with respect to this legislation.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman hold that an employee who is injured in the Government service through the negligence of another person should not in any case receive compensation for his injury?

Mr. SISSON. As a general proposition, yes. There may be exceptional cases. That is the reason why I assume that Congress has not been foolish in the past. That is the reason why I assume that the Republican majorities have not been foolish in the past. That is the reason why I assume that the Democratic majorities have not been foolish in the past. because there may be certain isolated cases where the employees of the Government are so much under the direction of their superior officer, dealing with some dangerous appliances or dealing with some machine that is dangerous in such a way that the employees have no right to control it, and by virtue of the carelessness of their superior officer are injured, the Government ought to pay the damages. But it ought to be an exceptional case and not the general rule.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to put a specific case to him?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. DYER. A case where an employee of the post office, in passing through a train shed, gets a sack of mail thrown on him through the carelessness of another employee who throwing a sack from the car to the track, and it falls on him, and he suffers injuries to the extent that he is absolutely, for a number of years, totally incapacitated and paralyzed. not that be a case where Congress would be justified in authorizing the payment of damages for the injuries received?

Mr. SISSON. If I were on the committee, that would depend entirely upon the conduct and the care exercised by the man injured. If he were injured without any negligence on his

Mr. DYER. Absolutely— Mr. SISSON. If he were injured without any negligence on his part, I would be in favor of making that an exceptional case. Mr. DYER. There is a case just like that pending in the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SISSON. It is such cases as that which Congress in its wisdom has seen fit in the past to make payment for. I presume that claims have been paid that ought not to be paid, but the gentleman knows that many cases in court are lost that ought to be gained and that many cases are gained that ought to be lost.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield? Mr. SISSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman. Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman from Mississippi has made a study of the civil service. I wish to state a case on which I would like to get the gentleman's opinion. I went up to one of the departments, because my attention was called to an old man, and I found out from the chief that out of 223 employees, 72 men were over 72 years of age. They cost the Government from $85,000 to $90,000 a year in salaries, when 30 or 35 young men or women who would cost from $30,000 to $35,000 could do

Mr. SISSON. That is one of the evils of the civil service. That is one of the things that comes with the civil-service system; and if there is not some change, if there is not some law passed which will gradually eliminate those who reach certain ages, so that they may know the time is coming when their connection with the Government is going to cease, so that they may begin to do like people do in private life, begin to economize and save something for old age, and observe the old Bible admonition and go to the ant for wisdom, then you must of necessity do something with the old employees in the civil service or else the Government service is going to suffer. I shall not call the name of the department, but-

Mr. LOBECK. The Government is going to suffer. Mr. SISSON. The Government is going to suf The Government is going to suffer by the inefficiency of the service. The head of one of the departments called my attention to the fact that there were numbers of people in his department who could not get up to their offices if it were not for the elevators, and after they get there they are totally incapacitated for doing anything. Yet on account of their age, on account of their length of service, they are drawing high salaries from the Government. Now, the civil service has been in operation just about long enough for the number of employees that live beyond the average length of life to be perhaps almost at the maximum. I do not know whether the number has reached that point or not, but it will be reached, and the time will come, which can be determined from the mortuary statistics, when the maximum number of old people will be in the service. Those who are too old to render any service are the ones who are an overhead charge, and it is perhaps more expensive to keep them there than it would be to retire them in some way. But I, as a citizen of this Republic, am unwilling to say to the man who has lived under the roof of a Government building, who has without any thought on his part except the performance of routine duties which the graduate of an ordinary high school could perform—I am unwilling to say to him, "You may live as you please, you may squander your means, and when you get old I will take care of you, but the man living on the farm, the man working in the factory, the man working for wages everywhere else, the man who has to manage his own affairs must carve out his own small destiny in his own small way," as the majority of the people do. I am unwilling that those men should be taxed to pay the expenses of an old-age civil-service pension; and the old men and women in private life must either become a charge upon the Government in some poorhouse or some asylum or some one must care for him, or he must exercise economy and business judgment and save something to live on in a rainy day. I am unwilling to have that stamp of royalty placed upon a man who happens to hold a place in the civil service, and to say that the balance of the people of the United States owe him a livelihood for all time to come. [Applause.]

I am unwilling to admit that the holding of a Government position gives him the right, after serving a certain number of years, to call upon the taxpayers to contribute to him for the balance of his days to take care of him, when the man in private life must so manage his own affairs that he can take care of himself in old age. Therefore, if you shall ever have a civil-service pension list, the voters and taxpayers of the country will never permit you to single out this class and give them the royal privilege of riding upon the backs of labor, not only while they are rendering Government service, but after they have ceased to render service to continue to remain upon the backs of the toilers of America. When you pension the civil-service employee, you must in justice pension the man who pays the taxes when he becomes unfortunate.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman waxes very eloquent, but we have a condition confronting us.

Mr. SISSON. The only question is whether it is true or false. Have I reached a true or false conclusion? Will the gentleman from Nebraska say here on this floor that he wants to single out and put in an excepted class the favored few who hold office, or that he wants to put them in a position where they can live all of their days as they please, and the people of his district be called upon—the old, the helpless, and the blind, in private life—to continue to contribute out of their earnings to take care of some employee of the Government who was not able to save or would not save a part of his salary?

Mr. DYER. How does the gentleman— Mr. SISSON. One moment. I will ask the gentleman from Nebraska if he is willing to do that?

Mr. LOBECK. I am interested in good service.

Mr. SISSON. I ask you a direct question. You say I grew eloquent. Now, I deny the mild impeachment, unless eloquence is the truth. If the gentleman means by eloquence that I have and you will pardon the personal allusion. When I was a young told the truth about it, then there is no difference between him and me on the subject.

Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman is always eloquent.

Mr. SISSON. Then I am always truthful.

Mr. LOBECK. Well, I believe so; but we have a condition that exists, and there ought to be a remedy provided for it. You have invited these men to take a civil-service examination and enter the service under certain conditions of employment.

Mr. SISSON. I never extended any invitation.
Mr. LOBECK. The Government did.
Mr. SISSON. The invitations have always come to me. will tell you what I can do. I can go back to my district, and I could go back to my State, and, I believe, I could fill every office in the Federal Government, and I would never have to extend an invitation.

Mr. LOBECK. There are Democrats in my district who are complaining to-day about the civil service, which was instituted by a Democratic administration-

Mr. SISSON. They are complaining about it, and I believe they have a right to complain. There was a proposition which was contained in a nonpartisan bill supported on both sides of this Chamber, which I believe was reported upon the legislative bill, or one of the appropriation bills here, which made provision that after a civil-service employee had served for five years then he should be required to make a certain degree, and then, after serving five years more, he should be required to make another degree, of proficiency before he could be reported for the next higher service. In that way you would weed out the inefficient. This bill should have become the law. In that way you would retain in the Government service those men who are capable of earning their salaries, and then you would have constantly before the Government employee the idea that he might have to go back into private life.

Take the young man in college, when he gets back into private life he becomes economical. Do you want to take away all the lessons taught by the ancient philosophers to their and to the children in medieval times-say to the children in modern times that we renounce these truths and the lessons of economy taught in the sacred writ; we have done away with the philosophy of the great philosophers of the past, who have taught the doctrine of frugality so as to live within your means and be able to pay your debts and support your family?

The great trouble in America to-day is that we are living vastly beyond our means. We have arrived at the most expensive age in the history of the world. We who are not able to live luxuriously are desirous of imitating others who live luxuriously. The Government employees are buying automobiles and pledging their salary in order to have the privilege of joy riding. The Government employees live like all other peoplebeyond their means. There is but one way by which you can exist in this cruel world. When God made the world, as He did, He made mouths that grow hungry, backs that grow cold, and He laid upon every man the injunction that by the sweat of his face shall he earn his daily bread. You here want to reverse that injunction and say to the Government employee, 'If you go on the pay roll, we are not going to require the burdens of you that are required of citizenship; we are going to relieve you from being frugal; we are going to put you in a favored class, where the cold of winters will not freeze you, where leaky roofs will not cause you sleepless nights, where penury and want will never stare you in the face as long as the Treasury of the United States can wring from the people who pay the taxes enough to pay you a pension; we are going to provide for you the life of the butterfly that floats around during the summer when he ought to be laying something up, sipping flowers that grow in the gardens and fields of the world. and when he gets old and winter comes we are going to say you can keep on your good way; we will bring to you the flowers. You can have your life of luxury, because you are in the favored class, holding office under the Federal Government." I am not willing to reverse all the philosophy of the past. If any man has studied the history of philosophy, you will find that has been true. Are you going now to say that you are going to reverse all this?

Gentlemen, you may take your course, but I am going to take the advice of Holy Writ and ask Government employees to follow the example of the ant and lay by something in the summer so that when the winter comes they may have something to care mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SISSON. Yes.
Mr. LOBECK. The gentleman will lead the procession, will for them.

he not?

Mr. SISSON. I will. I have endeavored in my way to do that, man, 18 years of age, I had been taught in an old-school Presbyterian family to imitate the ants. From the time I was 18 years old not one dollar was contributed to my support to this good hour, because the Civil War came on and what we had was destroyed. My father served four years in the Confederate Army. He never during his entire existence made any complaint to his boys about the Federal Government or about the [Applause.] On the other hand, losing all that he had, he devoted four years of his life to what he in his heart knew to be right, and went back as a young man and a year or two after the war married my mother, and they together established a little home. I was born 21 miles from a railroad, in I was taught that lesson by father. That was the lesson I

I was taught that lesson by father. learned then, and by virtue of a kind Providence I have been able, by what little success I have had, to put myself in a reasonable condition and where I hope my family will never suffer from want. [Applause.]

I do not know what would have happened if I had been born in luxury, and so I say to every boy in America that you are blessed and not cursed when you are born in poverty. The most fortunate boy, if he has honest parents, is the boy born in poverty, because he has every incentive to energy and enterprise, and the great industries of this country—the mines, the railroads, and the factories—are all calling for men. There is not a good man whose services are valuable that is out of a job to-day. [Applause.]

You find men doing mere manual labor that are out of a Job, but the man who is capable of managing affairs in this country can always find a glorious opportunity. The boy that deserves more credit for success than any other is the boy born in luxury, with a silver spoon in his mouth, who has no oppor-tunity to learn the lessons of economy and industry, who, despite all that, succeeds. He must have a great deal of initiative in him in order that he may succeed. But the boy born in poverty, having had to work for his success, is made strong by the exercise of his individuality; and that is what has made the Americans the strong people of the world, because they came into the forests and built the homes and the United States. It made us strong. In order that you may have strong employees in the Government service you must keep that lesson before them, Let them understand that the rules that apply to men in private life will be applied to them, and when you do have a merit system irrespective of party connections and let them understand that the man that can do the most work and do it the best is the man that is going to be promoted and get the best salary, then you have a good system.

The best civil-service pension bill that can be passed is to have the civil-service law administered on the merit system and not on account of politics. That is what will make the Government employees understand, as men in private life do, that they are going to be rewarded for services rendered. That is what we need. There is too much sickly sentimentality about these Government jobs. They talk about it as if a man was making a sacrifice when he accepts a Government job. these people in the galleries; ask the people who are writing you letters whether they are undesirable places. they all want them? They are glad to get into the Government service. I have now more applications than I could possibly fill, even if you were to throw down the civil-service doors. Men like these jobs that pay a hundred or a hundred and fifty or two hundred dollars a month. Yet you find men on this floor who, because some civil-service employee may write back to the district, are willing to exempt them from all the in-clemencies of the weather of life and put them in a hothouse, to be cared for for all time to come.

Gentlemen, I have talked three or four times as long as I had intended to, but gentlemen having asked questions brought this matter up, and I have trespassed longer than I intended.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the principle involved in this bill is one that should receive the attention of every member of this committee. The only objection that can be raised to it is that it represents a practice of singling out certain claims and submitting them to the House for consideration and not according this as a right to the general public when simi-I was quite interested in the position taken by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. Dies], who stated he favored this bill but was opposed to the general principle. I believe it should be the policy of the House to try to enact legislation covering all these different classes of cases and save the respective committees the burden of passing upon their respective merits. Because I believe that should be the practice I offered in the Post Office Committee and on the floor of the House when the Post Office appropriation bill was under consideration a measure that extended relief to all of the postal employees of the State of Michigan, and in the State of New York, and other the country. The intention was to bring in the laborers, to bring in the menial employees who were not provided for in the amendment that was adopted by the House. I was quite surprised that gentlemen on the other side of the aisle did not accept my amendment. If they had, they would have been relieved of considering this kind of legislation.

This bill provides for an appropriation of $1,500 to be paid to the family of a menial employee of the Government. The provision that was adopted in the Post Office supply bill singled out those employees that had powerful organizations back of them, leaving out of consideration entirely the poor postal employees, the laborers and mechanics, who are not organized, who have no representatives in the corridors looking after their interests to see that they would not be overlooked. mittee in its judgment saw fit to only single out railway mail-clerks and letter carriers and rural letter carriers and one or two other grades of the Postal Service, and left out of consideration the laborers who are obliged to do the heavy work, the carrying of weighty mail sacks, men who are engaged in a hazardous employment, and also the mechanics who are overseeing machinery that might subject them to injury. These were all left out.

But there were other objections I then raised to the consideration of that bill at that time, because we were seeking to pay $2,000 not to dependent relatives, but $2,000 to sons and daughters of full age, who would probably not be dependent, and not, in my opinion, entitled to the gratuity of the Government. In this particular instance we provide for an appropriation of $1,500 to the heirs of this deceased laborer. From the report it shows that the heirs are minor children, the oldest being at present 16 years of age.

The committee has departed from a policy that has been pursued for years and years in voting one year's salary, and has voted here a lump-sum appropriation of $1,500. That brings up the large subject as to what should be the duty of the Government toward injured employees. I can not subscribe to the principles enunciated by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson] in saying that Government employees are not entitled to the same consideration for compensation in case of injury as are those engaged in private employment. I think that when a Government employee is engaged in any line of work he should receive the same consideration as though he was employed in private employment. The gentleman from Mississippi says that they are the agents of the Government. Following out his argument to a logical extreme, you would have these agents of the Government working for nothing, working purely for the honor and glory, as some of the agents of the Government in this Chamber may do. But when you come to the question of workmen's compensation the principle that is being so generally extended in all the States to all the employees in private employment should be extended to Government employees. State acts do not distinguish in case of death as to the character of the employment, but provide payment to the surviving dependent relatives-always dependent relatives-an amount generally based upon the salary which the deceased employee was receiving at the time of his death.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. STAFFORD. In just a moment. Generally it is a greater amount than $1,500. I know of no instance where so low an amount is paid to dependent immediate relatives as $1,500. Generally the minimum is $2,000, and sometimes $3,000 and more. I now yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman from Wisconsin indicates that he would place the Government employee on the same plane with the man employed in private business. Does he favor a general law to that effect?

Mr. STAFFORD. I most certainly favor a general law giving to every Government employee who is injured through accidental injury and not through any fault of his own—

Mr. BARTLETT. While engaged in the service?

Mr. STAFFORD. While engaged in the service-a claim, along the lines recommended in the Post Office appropriation bill, to compensation for salary for a year at full pay, and during the second year, if he is still injured, at half pay; and if, perchance, during that time, or even at the time of his injury, he loses his life, to reward his dependent relatives-his immediate dependent relatives-by a stated amount along the lines of these workmen's compensation acts.

Mr. FOWLER. Then you do not favor it as a lump sum, but progressive States—I do not know whether the progressive State of Illinois has adopted a workmen's compensation act or not-

Mr. FOWLER. It has.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the gentleman knows the amount paid as a gratuity or as an insurance to the deceased's dependent relatives is a fixed amount. So in my State $2,000, $3,000, and in some instances as high as $4,000

Mr. FOWLER. I understood the gentleman that he favored paying a salary for one year for the injury and half salary for the next year?

Mr. STAFFORD. To the injured employee if he is disabled from employment for that time.

Mr. FOWLER. Why not pay the employee the full amount of his injury?

Mr. STAFFORD. Do you mean to give him the right to go into a court of law?

Mr. FOWLER. I am not saying that exactly. I am not fixing the way to get it. If you are going to recompense the injured employee, why not give him full compensation for the injury which he has sustained?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think we are not very far apart. believe very strongly that the National Government should be responsible for the same risks of employment as that of a private concern, and that there should be some board created that would determine what the value of that injury would be. Take it in the case of a postal employee, for example; if he should be so injured that he would be deprived of earning a livelihood the rest of his days, he should be compensated for the injury along the lines of these private workmen's compensation acts. think the principle involved in those acts is a humanitarian one. It follows the modern idea that the employment should bear the risk of the burdens of all accidental injuries and should be charged with the liability resulting from that employ-

Mr. FOWLER. One question further now. The gentleman is a lawyer of considerable experience, I understand. He is in favor of extending to the public employee the advantages of recovery for an injury, and I would like to ask him if he would extend also the rules of assumed risk and the rules of injury by a fellow servant?

Mr. STAFFORD. In reply to my friend from Illinois, I wish to say to him that the modern principle expressed in workmen's compensation acts disposes of those two principles of assumed risk or of risk arising from the fellow-servant doctrine. The modern idea, which I had just stated before the last question was propounded, is that the employment takes the burden and all the attendant liabilities of that employment, and it should be charged with it. Just because the Government undertakes some private work, or even if it does not engage in a private line of work, if the employee while engaged in his calling in his special line of duty is injured the Government should be responsible; and because of the fact that the old viewpoint was that the Government could not be sued, it was never intended that the Government should escape the full responsibility that the obligation of employment naturally assumed. So I should wipe away, as all these workmen-compensation acts wipe away, the doctrine of assumed liability and the fellow-servant doctrine.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, then, would you apply the rule of contributory negligence?

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course that brings up a wide subject, and I do not care about going into it at this time. It is a question as to whether a person who is directly responsible for his own injury should be compensated either when employed in private employment or by the Government. Of course no State compensation act, so far as I am aware, recognizes any liability on the part of the employer for an injury that is wholly the result of the person's own willful negligence. Now, many of the compensation acts do recognize the doctrine of partial contributory negligence, and it is referred to the compensation boards to determine what is the contributing cause and to what extent was the employee's negligence responsible for the injury.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. I think in some of the more recent laws there is a provision that it shall not be effective when it is intentional or due to intoxication.

Mr. STAFFORD. And that brings up the subject of direct negligence.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that the theory is carried in the different compensation acts as to the proportion of the

Mr. STAFFORD. It shall not be a bar to recovery unless the injury is due to his own deliberate act.

Mr. BARTLETT. It directs what the damages shall be, but not the right to recover.

Mr. TALCOTT of New York. In these compensation laws the amount is fixed in the law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Take Wisconsin, which has the most advanced law on the statute books. During the last session of the legislature it was amended so as to include cases of con-tributory negligence. The amount to be paid is determinate, but no person receives any compensation where the accident or the injury is the direct and exclusive result of his own negligence and where he is entirely at fault.

Mr. FOWLER. Have you a provision in the Wisconsin law

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; we have, as I recall it.

FOWLER. If a general law should be passed, a compensation act for Federal employees, would the gentleman favor such a provision in that law?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think no mistake would be made by the National Government if we were to follow the Wisconsin compensation law and adopt it and extend it to all Government employees. I think that law is one that has been very well considered by students of this question and has been successful, so far as it has been put into operation.

Mr. FOWLER. Did the gentleman from Wisconsin help to thrash out that law?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have never served in the Wisconsin Legislature, but I have given considerable attention to this question, and when I was out of Congress during the last term I not only studied that law, but I also studied the laws of other States on the subject; and when I was engaged in framing the bill that I have offered in the committee and to the House I followed somewhat the lines of that law. Of course I knew that if I should submit as an amendment to the Post Office appropriation bill a general law involving all grades of employment it would probably not be accepted.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me an interruption there?

Mr. STAFFORD. In just a moment. Then I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman. I knew that a provision extending the application of the law to every character of service would not be considered on the appropriation bill. Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does the gentleman think he is doing his duty under his oath by delaying an appropriation that has already been delayed nearly three years—an appropriation in the interest of poor children without a father and mother, whose father died with the lockjaw and the mother fell in the street? Is that statesmanship, sir, that you shall thus talk against time? If you had found a human being lying injured on the street, would you wait to discuss the question before you went for a doctor?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield. Mr. DONOVAN. I do not think that is humane, but the gentleman must talk.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, we are all accustomed to the eccentric conduct of the gentleman from Connecticut. He assumes the rôle of public censor, and of course he is qualified to assume that rôle. I rose here to discuss the bill, and I do not need any suggestions from so short-serving a Member as the gentleman.

This bill represents a policy which I think should be restricted. am entirely within my rights when I state my opinion. Mr. TALCOTT of New York. That is right.

Mr. STAFFORD. We should pass some general law, so that every employee would be entitled to this compensation without taking up the time of Congress with special bills, and I think I am doing a worthy service, notwithstanding the captious remarks of the ubiquitous gentleman from Connecticut. I contend that we would do much better if we were to pass some general law, so that all persons would have the right to come into a private court, and not to compel minor children to go to Representatives in Congress and ask that they intercede, ask that they take up the time of the committee, to take up the time of the House, and take up the time of another body in passing upon their claims. It should be a right extended to all and known to all. I think the Committee on Claims could not have their time better employed than by bringing in a general bill that would extend compensation to all these cases. I recognize that it is beyond the jurisdiction of the Committee on Claims

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to say that to the gentleman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yet we should have something done that would take away these private cases from the attention of Con-If these minor children are entitled to compensation, then all the minor children of persons similarly situated who have given up their lives should be compensated.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be glad to yield to my friend from North Carolina.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I will say to my friend that nobody realizes more forcibly than do the members of the Committee on Claims the truth of all that the gentleman has said. But to quote some language used by a distinguished Chief of this Nation some years ago, "It is a condition that confronts" the Committee on Claims and "not a theory."

Committee on Claims and "not a theory.

Mr. GARDNER rose.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STAFFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield to my friend from New Jersey [Mr. McCoy].

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there are now in the hands of the Judiciary Committee six bills, I think, having for their purpose the granting of compensation to all injured employees of the Government. They are referred to a subcommittee, and I hope shortly the subcommittee will report them to the full committee, and I hope shortly that the com-mittee will report them to the House favorably.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do they cover all Government employees or only certain branches of the service?

Mr. McCOY. They are general bills, covering all the civil employees of the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this legislation along the line of State compensation acts? Will the gentleman inform us?

Mr. McCOY. I will say that in certain respects it is, and in certain respects it is not. One bill is drawn on the basis of the so-called Brantley bill, referring to employees on interstate railroads. Another bill was drawn by the Commission for Industrial Legislation. The Bureau of Labor Statistics in the Department of Labor has prepared a bill somewhat similar to the one I last mentioned, but differing in some respects; but they are both very comprehensive bills.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The matter that is being debated here does not seem to affect or be concerned with the question whether this appropriation should be $1,500 or less. The gentleman is giving a history of legislation on certain matters pending before a certain committee. It has nothing at all to do with the appropriation proposed here, whether it should be a certain amount or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the question is what the policy of Congress should be, whether we should pay a certain amount, whether it should be $5,000 or $1,500. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCov] was just enlightening the committee as to the policy of bills of a general character, soon to be considered. I think we all ought to be thankful to the gentleman from New Jersey for his statement that the Committee on the Judiciary is preparing legislation that will avoid taking the time of Congress in considering these private bills. I am in favor of general legislation and not special legislation. I rose to point out that the time of Congress should not be taken up in the con-sideration and passage of these private bills, but that it should be saved that trouble by having some general law passed.

I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Garb-

NEEL.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in reference to certain details of the immigration bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in reference to the immigration bill. Is there objec-

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I should like not to exceed five minutes, and possibly not more than three.

Mr. POU. I ask unanimous consent that at the close of the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa all debate on this bill be considered closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the Committee on Claims asks unanimous consent that all debate on this bill be closed at the end of five minutes, that time to be occupied by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Green]. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object. Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum present. This is a ridiculous way of doing business.

Mr. MANN. This part of it right now is the most ridiculous

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I regret that the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson] is not present at this time. I listened with great pleasure and interest to his eloquent remarks, but it seemed to me they had little application to the bill which is under consideration.

To my mind it is a most monstrous doctrine that the Government of the United States should not be responsible for wrongs done by its agents in the course of their employment. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson] said he was opposed to this bill because the Government simply acted through agents, for whom the people were not responsible. On the contrary, the people are, or ought to be, responsible for the acts of their agents. The heads of departments ought to be responsible for the acts of their underemployees. The people ought to be responsible for the acts of those at the head of the Government, who are conducting its affairs, and they ought to respond in the who are conducting its affairs, and they ought to respond in the same manner as a private institution should. In fact, I would go further than simply to make the Government responsible where its employees are injured. I would go as far as the most humanitarian in this humanitarian age. The modern doctrine is not so cruel and so harsh as it was in the times when it was thought necessary to protect the employer from damages claimed by his employees by doctrines of assumed risk and contributory negligence. . I would make the Government responsible in the same manner as the private individual. Bills have been introduced, and I hope they will shortly come before this House for consideration, taking up this most important subject. There is, as I think, a crying need that we should adopt some sort of uniform legislation in relation to these matters. The Committee on Claims is not so organized that it can properly consider these matters. I served upon that committee for some time, and I know the difficulties under which it labors. It brings in here bills which are often subjected to criticism. Sometimes the criticism may be well directed, and yet the committee has done the best it could with the feeble means that are given to it for consideration of the matters before it. The results are not always equal, not always fair, and sometimes possibly not just, because they do not give to the aggrieved person the amount he ought to receive. This shows most emphatically that we need and ought to take up a bill for the compensation of all Government employees who are injured. And I would go even further than that. I believe that if the Government in the course of its operations causes injury and damage to any person, that person ought to have the right to establish his claim against the Government for the injury. If the Government causes injury or damage to some one who is not in its employment, that person ought to have some different means of obtaining redress than the means which are now afforded. These bills which are now before the House only provide for relief to Government em-ployees. I expect to go further and to introduce a bill which will give relief to others who are injured by the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the bill be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. That is the ordinary procedure when general debate is finished—to read the bill for amendment.

Mr. POU. I ask that the Clerk read the bill, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs of the late Samuel H. Donaldson, who died from injuries received in the performance of his duties under the appraiser of merchandise at the port of New York, the sum of $5,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 8, strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation. The motion was agreed to.

C. M. HAMMOND.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (H. R. 10345) for the relief of C. M. Hammond.

ject.

Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no this is a ridiculous way of doing business.

In the control of the point of the purpose of this bill, so that the committee may understand it. I apprehend that there can be no opposition to the bill. This man, C. M. Hammond, sent $150 worth of internal-revenue stamps through the mail-

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is general debate now in order? Has the bill been reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has not been reported.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that general debate is in order in this kind of a proceeding? proceeding?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly it is in order, after the bill has been reported.

Mr. McCOY. Then, I should like to go on record as having been in order when I was talking about the compensation bill. Mr. McCOY. When I was engaged in a colloquy with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Staffond] about the bill pending in the Judiciary Committee on the matter of compensation, the Chair ruled that we were both out of order because we were not talking to the particular bill which was being considered. may want to talk on compensation.

Mr. BARTLETT. I beg to call the attention of the Chair and of the gentleman from New Jersey to the fact that we are not in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but we are in Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of private bills, and it is only on public bills, when the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that general debate on any subject is in order, as I understand it. So the Chair was absolutely right.

Mr. McCOY. That is the point I want to have cleared up.

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding of the Chair is that we are in Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and that when a Member is recognized he is entitled to an hour, but he must discuss the question before the House; and if the point of order is raised that he is not discussing the bill before the House, the Chair must hold that he is out of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. The point is that if a Member is discussing the general subject of the bill he is in order.

Mr. MANN. Certainly he is in order.
Mr. BARTLETT. I did not make that point.
Mr. STAFFORD. We were discussing the general subject then under consideration before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill. The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $150 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay to C. M. Hammond, of New York City, N. Y., a deputy collector of internal revenue, in compensation for money paid by him into the Treasury of the United States for cigar stamps supposed to have been lost in the United States mails, but thereafter found and delivered to the collector of internal revenue at Albany, N. Y.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, there ought not to be any controversy, it seems to me, over this bill. The stamps appear to have been temporarily lost in the mail, but were afterwards found at a hotel. The Government has got the stamps back and this gentleman is charged with the value thereof, $150.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman I certainly have no disposition to make any criticism of the Committee on Claims or its reports, because I know the arduous work that that committee performs. May I ask the gentleman whether this bill was referred to the Treasury Department for any opinion in reference to it, and if so why the opinion was not put in the report?

Mr. POU. The letter of the Treasury Department came in on the date of February 2, after the report was printed. I have the letter in my hand and will show it to the gentleman, if he wishes.

Mr. MANN. Is it the policy of the Committee on Claims when they refer a bill to the Treasury Department for report to report the bill before they get the information?

Mr. POU. That is not the policy of the committee; it happened in this one case.

Mr. BARTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. POU. Certainly.

Mr. BARTON. Does the letter confirm the statement set out here in the report?

Mr. POU. Absolutely. I will read it to the gentleman, if he wishes.

Mr. BARTON. No; I only wanted the gentleman's state-

The Clerk read the bill for amendment. Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation. The motion was agreed to.

DR. L. W. CULBREATH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10763) for the relief of Dr. L. W. Culbreath.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Dr. L. W. Culbreath, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000, as reward for his services in capturing one Frank Hart, alias W. B. Conrad, who robbed a mail car on train No. 104, Illinois Central Railroad, at Memphis, Tenn., June 21, 1911.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, just a word of explanation about this bill. This man Hart was an old offender. Gentlemen who have taken the pains to read the report, I think, will find the facts sufficiently stated. The United States attorney drew a bill or indictment that contained four counts. Two were drawn under section 193 of the Criminal Code of the United States, and the third and fourth counts were under section 197. Now, this man was allowed by the United States attorney to plead guilty to the first two counts in the indictment, and counts 3 and 4 were nol-prossed. Dr. Culbreath, who captured this old offender, would have received a reward without any action on the part of the Congress if Hart had been convicted under counts 3 and 4. It appears beyond all doubt-and the Post Office Department so states in a letter—that this offender was guilty under the counts under which Culbreath would have received the reward. It is said that this man was an old offender, and it was suggested that because Dr. Culbreath happened to catch him burglarizing a store it was perhaps his desire to cut Dr. Culbreath out of the reward. We believe, from every standpoint, that Dr. Culbreath should have $1,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as far as I can ascertain from the report, the claimant in this case was not seeking the criminal for any offense that had been committed against the Government. The man was captured by a posse while burglarizing a store. The doctor was not hunting this men for any crime that he had committed against the United States, as far as the report shows. Having captured the man who was burglarizing the store, in order to protect the local citizens, it is discovered that the person captured has committed an offense against the United States laws. I do not see where the claimant has any equitable claim against the Government. He might have had the legal claim against the Government, but it turns out that he has no legal claim because of a technicality. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee, who introduced the bill, where a man makes a claim against the Government that is a technical claim, why the Government should not avail itself of a technical defense?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the fact about it is this: After Hart had been taken by this posse the Federal authorities recognized him as an old offender and sought to obtain his person by arrangement with the State authorities. Of course, the act that he was committing at Stanton was an offense against the State law, but the Federal authorities made an arrangement with the State authorities that the Federal Government should take charge of him instead of leaving him in the State courts to be tried.

Mr. MANN. I understand, but the doctor would not have received the $1,000 if the State had prosecuted the man. he had been making a search for this offender, if he had been making efforts to capture him, then when he was captured and the Government did not prosecute on some count which would give the allowance, I think he would have a strong equitable claim. But it was a mere incident, so far as this claimant was concerned, that this offender happened to be an offender against the United States Government, because all the doctor was seeking to do was to protect the local authorities and the local citizens. He was not hunting this man because he had committed an offense.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is true, Dr. Culbreath is not engaged as a detective. He is a physician.

Mr. MANN. I am not speaking of detectives particularly. Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is true, perhaps, he was not out at that time hunting for this man. His profession is that of a physician.

Mr. MANN. It is not likely that he knew who the man was. Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think he knew of the robbery of the mail car, because that had excited a good deal of atten-

Mr. MANN. Very likely.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know that he thought of this man at the time as being the man who committed the mail robbery. I have no information on that subject, but I do not think, if the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, that under this reward provision of the law it was the inten-tion that a man in order to obtain the reward should be engaged in the business of running down the criminal.

Mr. MANN. Not at all, but the intention was when the Government offered the reward that the man who should obtain the reward would give to the Government in some way some valuable information. This man gave no information; he found a man burglarizing the store and seized him for that offense.

The Government authorities, learning the name of the man, identified him as a criminal under the Government statutes and asked for his possession. Now, the doctor did not aid in any way toward that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman means in giving information as to the character of the man?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. No; so far as the report is concerned, he did not. Still I think, if the gentleman is urging that as an objection, he is rather technical about it.

Mr. MANN. I say that if a man under the law is technically entitled to a reward, he is entitled to it, but he is not technically entitled to it under the law. I do not see where he has any equitable claim for it. If he had rendered any service to the Government, the Government would pay him, but he has rendered no service to the Government.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, he caught the criminal. Mr. MANN. But he did not render any service to the Government. He seized a man whom he found burglarizing a store, and the Government comes in and claims the man.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN.

Certainly.

ATRICK. Had there been any reward offered at the man? Mr. KIRKPATRICK. any time by any authorities for the apprehension of this man? Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The statute itself provides a standing reward, as I understand it.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. But there had been no special offer? Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Oh, I suppose there was an lvertisement under the general law. They are often issued, advertisement under the general law. They are often issued, and I suppose they were in this case. The general law provides for the reward.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not the law, but the general order of the department.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. That is the point,

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Perhaps that is more accurate. Mr. STAFFORD. The order of the department is to pay $1,000 for the arrest and conviction of any person charged with robbing the United States mail. It is merely an order on the part of the department.

Mr. POU. It is to encourage the apprehension of men who violate the law. Dr. Culbreath captured the man and the man was guilty. The department says he was. I differ with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Mann]. I do not see any reason why the Government should take advantage of a technicality and refuse to pay

Mr. MANN. The only reason is that the claimant himself is taking advantage of a technicality to ask the money.

Mr. POU. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. Dr. Culbreath saw a light in a store. If it had been some other man he might have gone by and not risked his life, but Dr. Culbreath went in there at the risk of his life, or at the risk of injury to limb or body. He captured this man and run him in, and it turned out that the man was an old offender that the United States Government was looking for.

Mr. MANN. But he did not do that because of the reward offered or because he knew any reward was offered. He did not know that, and he did not know that the man had anything to do with the offense for which he was finally prosecuted by the Government.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit to my distinguished friend that that position ought not to be considered. The question is whether or not when he saw a man violating the law he went and caught him, and whether or not this is the man the Government was hunting for; and if we do not pay this reward there will be no incentive for other men to go out and take their lives in their hands to capture offenders.

Mr. MANN. I take it that is the position of the Committee on Claims. I would like to know why the Government of the United States should pay a reward of $1,000 because some citizen sees a light in a store and goes in and seizes a man burglarizing a store, a crime with which we have nothing to do; but that is the argument of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. POU. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon, but that is not my argument.

I will not undertake to say what the gentle-Mr. MANN. man's argument is, but that is the way I take it.

Mr. POU. Perhaps I may be so very obtuse that I do not make myself plain.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I never knew the gentleman to be guilty of that.

Mr. POU. But it does seem to me that this is the situation: Here is a reward offered for the capture of a certain man who is guilty of a certain offense. That reward does not apply to officers alone; it applies to anybody and everybody. A man is found robbing a store. Dr. Culbreath nabs him, and when he gets him in the United States court it is found that he is an old offender, and probably because the man was angered with Dr. Culbreath he said: "I will not submit to the offense which will entitle Dr. Culbreath to this reward, but I will submit to another offense and deprive him of the reward."

Mr. MANN. I think part of the gentleman's remarks are entirely gratuitous, when he says that the district attorney did wrong on a certain portion of the indictment, because, perhaps, he did not like Dr. Culbreath.

Mr. POU. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. say that about the district attorney. I said that this old offender probably said that, or had it in mind. The Post Office Department says that he is an old offender, and that they have been hunting him for a long time, and that he was probably guilty of other offenses. I was referring to Hart. nothing about the district attorney.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how the offender could determine what counts in the indictment he would be sentenced for.

Mr. POU. I think the gentleman, with his large practice in the courts, can very easily understand the position of a district attorney, with hundreds of cases pressing him. man says he is willing to submit, and the district attorney knows he can inflict adequate punishment upon him if he does submit to a particular count, the district attorney is justified in adopting that course.

Mr. MANN. I think it is rather far-fetched to say that the offender determines on what count he will be prosecuted and would plead guilty to certain counts in order to keep Dr. Culbreath from getting a reward, which probably he did not know anything about.

Mr. POU. The offender always selects the counts on which he offers to plead guilty.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but he does not determine whether he will be prosecuted on the other counts.

Mr. POU. Of course that is true.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Strange as it may seem, I really think there is some truth in the suggestion that this man did plead guilty on these counts, and that there was an agreement that that would be accepted, this man agreeing to plead guilty in order to prevent Dr. Culbreath from getting this reward. But the district attorney was not a party to that purpose, of course.

I know the district attorney well, and have known him ever since I knew anybody.

Mr. MANN. The district attorney was a party to what took

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think the district attorney thought about the reward at that time. The fact is there are letters from the district attorney in the department, and I have been over those papers. This man could have been easily convicted under these other counts, but for some reason and I do not know just why-he was permitted to plead guilty upon these two counts, and his plea of guilty was accepted, and it disposed of the case. He got, I think, the same sentence that he would have received if he had pleaded guilty to or been convicted under the other counts. I do not think there was any difference in the amount of the time of his sentence. one of those long indictments, with four counts, and they disposed of the case. The proof was there, the evidence was all in, and they simply disposed of the case in that sort of a way. The fact is, here was a good citizen who exercised the authority that a good citizen ought to exercise, and captured this man. Under the law, if the robber had been convicted upon certain counts, Dr. Culbreath would have been entitled to receive this reward as a matter of right. The robber could have been, by the admission of everybody, convicted on those counts. He was not, but he pleaded guilty upon other counts. The plea of guilty was accepted, and he was given the sentence. I do not see why Dr. Culbreath is not entitled to this.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not going to discuss the matter and detain the committee, but the fact is that Dr. Culbreath did not do anything which equitably entitled him to the reward.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say this to the gentleman, it is possibly due to my oversight that I did not inquire of Dr. Culbreath, although I have talked over this matter with him, as to whether he knew, at the time that this reward was outstanding, or whether he had any suspicions when he saw the light in that little store at Stanton, that this was the man who committed the mail-car robbery or not. I have not asked him about it.

Mr. MANN. Hence I am right in assuming that Dr. Culbreath did not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The report does not show anything of that sort.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Suppose he had no knowledge of it, that it was purely an accident, and he had gone in and captured him just as the facts show he was captured, and he had been convicted on the third and fourth counts; that would clearly under the law entitle him to the reward?

Mr. MANN. Technically he would have received the money and technically he would have earned it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is not this reward due to him?

Mr. MANN. The question is, although he is not technically entitled to it, you propose to remove the technicality and give it to him. He might have earned it technically, without any equities on his part at all. He might have earned it legally, but here is a case where he has not earned it legally, so far as I can see, and has no equity to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does not the gentleman think a man who is passing a store that is being robbed, and goes in and captures the robber, is equitably entitled to the reward that is offered by the Government for that robber? It seems to me he is.

A man who passes a store where somebody is MANN. committing a breach of peace or violating the law and endeavors to stop it, having no reference whatever to the reward or the crime for which the reward is offered, is not legally entitled to the reward, and he has no equity.

Mr. POU. Nothing except to take the chance of getting killed. Mr. MANN. That had nothing to do with this case. It has not the slightest thing to do with it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think in order to be equitably entitled to it he should have been out hunting for the robber?

Mr. MANN. I think in order to be equitably entitled to it he must have done something for the purpose of getting hold of this man and getting information by which it could be secured.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But he got hold of the man.

Mr. MANN. But for another purpose entirely.
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the committee may be inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the report of the committee on this case may be inserted in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. May we not have it read? *
Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Do you object to its being inserted without being read?

Mr. MANN. I will object unless it is read. I think it ought to be read for information.

Mr. Chairman, then I ask Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. unanimous consent that the report be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. Gar-RETT] asks unanimous consent that the report of the committee be read. Is there objection?

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10763) for the relief of Dr. L. W. Culbreath, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass.

The facts in this case are as follows: Order No. 3171 of the Post Office Department, under date of June 2, 1910, provides that—

"On and after July 1, 1910, unless otherwise ordered, the Post Office Department will pay the following rewards, provided Congress shall make the necessary appropriation or authorize the payment of such rewards:

"First. One thousand dollars for the arrest and conviction of any person in the United States court on the charge of robbing the malis while being conveyed in any mail car attached to a railway train, and in violation of the provisions set forth in section 197, Penal Code, act of March 4, 1909, which reads as follows:

""Whoever shall assault any person having lawful charge, control, or custody of any mail matter, with intent to rob, steal, or purloin such mail matter or any part thereof, shall, for a first offense, be imprisoned not more than 10 years; and if in effecting or attempting to effect such robbery he shall wound the person having custody of the mail, or put his life in jeopardy by the use of a dangerous weapon, or for a subsequent offense, shall be imprisoned 25 years."

On June 21, 1911, a mail car on train No. 104, Illinois Central Railroad, was robbed at Memphis, Tenn., by one Frank Hart, alias W. B. Conrad, and an unidentified accomplice. Registered mail valued at $217 was taken, and the postal clerks in charge of said car were assaulted with dangerous weapons.

On July 5, 1911, Frank Hart was captured by a posse, in charge of Dr. L. W. Culbreath, while burglarizing a store at Stanton, Tenn. Thereafter Hart was indicted under a bill drawn under section 193, Criminal Code of the United States, charging Hart with entering a mail car by violence, and with the willful an Government offers a reward of $1,000 for the arrest and conviction of a person charged with a certain offense. Dr. L. W. Culbreath arrests such a person and turns him over to the United States authorities. The person is guilty of the offense charged; he could have been convicted; and it seems to the committee that morally the Government ought to pay this reward.

Letter from the Postmaster General, as appended hereto, is made a part of this report:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL, Washington, D. C., December 23, 1913.

Hon. EDWD. W. Pou, House of Representatives.

Hon. Edwd. W. Pou.

House of Representatives.

Sir: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your communication dated December 17, 1913, transmitting a copy of a bill for the relief of Dr. L. W. Culbreath (H. R. 10763), directing the payment of $1,000 "as reward for his services in capturing one Frank Hart, alias W. B. Conrad, who robbed a mail car on train No. 104, Illinois Central Railroad, at Memphis, Tenn., June 21, 1911," and requesting an expression of opinion relative to the merits of the claim.

The records of this department show that the above-mentioned mail car was robbed on June 21, 1911, at Memphis, Tenn., by Frank Hart, alias W. B. Conrad, and an unidentified accomplice, and that registered mail valued at $217 was obtained through this depredation after the postal clerks were assaulted and their lives placed in jeopardy by the use of dangerous weapons. The offenders escaped, and Frank Hart was snosequently apprehended by a posse, of which Dr. Culbreath was in charge, while burglarizing a store at Stanton, Tenn., July 5, 1911. The posse in question were returning after a search for another criminal, when their attention was attracted by a flash of light in the building in which Hart was then operating.

The connection of Hart with the robbery of the mail car was later established by post-office inspectors, and he was indicted for the offense on four counts, the first two of which were drawn under section 193 of the Criminal Code of the United States, charging Hart with entering a mail car by violence and the willful and malicious assault upon and interference with postal clerks in the discharge of their duties therein; and counts 3 and 4 of which, drawn under section 197 of the code, charged an assault with the intent to rob the postal clerks and with the robbing of them.

At the trial, by agreement with the United States attorney in charge of the prosecution, Hart was allowed to plead guilty to the first two counts of the indictment, while counts 3 and 4 were nol-prossed.

All the papers were referred to t

the code. Respectfully,

A. S. BURLESON, Postmaster General.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. Ansberry having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 31. Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the State of Florida be, and is hereby, granted the privilege of placing in Statuary Hall of the Capitol the statue of John Gorrie, now deceased, who was a citizen of Florida, illustrious for distinguished

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to bills of the following titles:

S. 832. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;
S. 833. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 834. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

T. S. WILLIAMS,

The committee resumed its session.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1055) for the relief of T. S. Williams.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That $1,000, or so much thereof as may be found due the claimant, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of T. S. Williams on account of services rendered as mail carrier to Williamsburg, Idaho, from January 1, 1901, to June 30, 1902, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay over whatever amount that may be due T. S. Williams as stated by the Postmaster General.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all of said bill after the enacting clause and substitute in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to T. S. Williams the sum of $315.55, in full compensation for payments made by the said T. S. Williams to secure the service of a mail carrier from August 6, 1900, to June 30, 1902, at Williamsburg, Idaho."

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, this is a very The facts are set forth in the committee report and show that the claimant is justly entitled to the amount recom-I move that the committee amendment be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it looks to me as though it was a very plain case, although I do not look at it from the same standpoint as does my distinguished friend from North Dakota.

As he has not explained the bill, it may be proper to tell the House what it is. The Government authorized the establishment of a post office at Williamsburg, Idaho, off the railroad. Under the law the Post Office Department, before a star route was established, authorized the postmaster at Williamsburg to employ a carrier to carry the mail between the railroad and Williamsburg at a rate of pay not to exceed, I think, threequarters of the postmaster's salary. Is that correct?

Mr. FRENCH. Two-thirds.

Mr. MANN. Two-thirds of the postmaster's salary. authority was given to the postmaster by the Post Office Department. The bill as introduced provided for the payment of $1,000. During the time for which the claim was brought the postmaster received a total salary of $70.75. There was a little less than two years' time, and under the law the Post Office Department had authorized the postmaster to employ a carrier at a rate of pay not to exceed two-thirds of this $70.75. That was the law. The postmaster was informed of the law. post office, I presume, had been established for the local convenience of the postmaster. He had been placed in charge. There was no mail there to speak of. The total salary of the postmaster for a year and 10 months or so was $70.75. That was 60 per cent of the receipts of the office, I take it. In was 60 per cent of the receipts of that to the carrier. He employed a carrier, and at one time the carrier made a claim to the Post Office Department. The Post Office Department was prepared to pay the claim on the basis of two-thirds of this salary, $70.75, or such portion of it as was cov-ered by the time involved in the claim. The Post Office De-partment did not pay the carrier, because it did not know where to find him.

Now the postmaster comes in and says that he paid $600 during the period of time, which is stated to be 1 year, 9 months, and 24 days, for a carrier, although the law did not authorize him to, and although the Post Office Department did not authorize him to, and although he had been specifically told that he could employ a carrier on the basis of two-thirds of his own salary.

I presume that the claimant, Mr. Williams, is now an old gentleman. I do not know, but I assume that he is well along in years, because his memory is evidently very inaccurate. He says in various places that he paid $600 a year to this carrier, and he says in various other places that he paid the carrier at the rate of $25 a month. Certainly any man who is not well along in years can tell that $25 a month would not amount to $600 in short of two years, and there is no pretense that the service performed covered more than a year and 10 months, or thereabouts. The recollection of a man whose memory is so inac-curate as to mistake $300 for $600 would not, to my mind, be a sufficient basis for action here.

Why should we go now and pay this claim that has never been earned? The carrier himself was entitled to receive, and is entitled to receive, two-thirds of $70.75 if he can be found. Or if the postmaster paid that sum, I am quite willing to subrogate him into the rank of the carrier. But when a man employed by the Government is distinctly told, under orders by the department, that he can incur a liability only to a certain extent, and then for his own convenience and for his own benefit he increases that liability in the neighborhood of ten times that, and waits for years to present his claim to the Government, I can see no reason why the Government should pay the money.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the bill as introduced provides not that Mr. Williams shall be compensated in the amount of $1,000, as has been suggested, but in the amount of "a thousand dollars or so much thereof as may be found due the claimant."

I introduced the bill before I was aware of the exact amount of his claim. The facts of the case are—
Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.
Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman willing to leave the bill as it stands without the amendment, and say it shall be "$ so much thereof as may be found due to the claimant"?

Mr. FRENCH. I think on the basis of what the Committee on Claims has determined is due, or upon what any jury that would consider the facts in the case might determine was due, I would be very willing to leave the language in the law as it was in my original draft of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman willing to leave in the original provision, which authorizes the payment of what may be found due the claimant, instead of a provision directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay a fixed amount?

Mr. FRENCH. I will reach that point in a few minutes and explain the difficulties that surround this case.

Mr. Chairman, the post office at Williamsburg, Idaho, was established, as has been stated, off the railroad. There was a small community there, with just one store. Mr. Williams, having the most available and convenient place for the post office, was appointed postmaster. He was authorized by the department to employ a carrier for the period that has been mentioned by the gentleman who has just spoken-nearly two years. There is a conflict between the statements of the department and of Mr. Williams upon the authorization that was given to Williams. The department insists that it authorized Mr. Williams to employ a carrier at not to exceed two-thirds of the salary of the postmaster. Mr. Williams insists that he was authorized to employ a carrier without any limitation.

Mr. MILLER Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?
Mr. FRENCH. Certainly.
Mr. MILLER. I think that is very essential in this case.
Is there any letter addressed to Mr. Williams or anything of that kind in the record?

Mr. FRENCH. No; there is no letter of that kind.

Mr. MANN. There are three letters there, but none on that Mr. FRENCH. Yes; they are not on that point. Mr. Williams sets forth that he was authorized to employ the carrier. I think probably that Mr. Williams was mistaken, but he was acting upon what he believed was the authority conferred upon him by the department. He employed a man by the name of Lee Carter to carry the mail, at $25 a month, for nearly two years. The department called for bids on the route more than once, and the bids that came in were in the amount of $450 and $400 for carrying the mails three times a week. In other words, to the man who was willing to carry the mail 18 miles from Wayan to Williamsburg, counting the distance there and back, there would be paid less than $2 per trip. I submit that the bid was a very reasonable bid. The department rejected the bids over and over, and finally, whether the carrier who submitted the final bid of $174 a year was assisted by the community or whether he was able to carry freight and express and passengers and in that way make up the loss that he would sustain by taking the contract at $174 per year, which is a little over a dollar per trip, the department awarded the contract for $174 per year for carrying the mails.

Mr. Williams, acting upon what he supposed was good authority, paid out $25 a month for the period of nearly two years, or nearly $600—probably $550. I think that probably that very amount could very well be paid to him under all the facts as set forth; but the committee took a different view. The committee said that the department awarded the contract for carrying the mail upon the basis of $174 a year. The committee said, "We can not see that we ought to go beyond that. We will go that far, however, and figure the amount due Mr. Williams upon the basis of the amount that was recited in the first contract for the carrying of the mail, which was $174 per annum, and, in other words, pay Mr. Williams $315.55."

I submit, gentlemen, that that is a debt that we ought to pay Mr. Williams, and that amount is little more than half of that which Mr. Williams himself was required to pay for the handling of the service of this post office.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Has Mr. Williams already paid that?

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Williams has paid it. It has been suggested that the department was ready to pay Lee Carter, the carrier, two-thirds of the salary of the postmaster. ment never did pay Lee Carter. After the time within which he should have been paid had lapsed, the department was authorized by an act of Congress to pay him, but it has never been able to locate Lee Carter. He was compensated by Mr. Williams, and therefore has no claim against the Post Office Department or the Government. Mr. Williams, acting upon the authority that he thought he had, incurred this responsibility. We are now merely proposing to pay him a little more than half what he paid out, and that upon the basis of the very first contract that was let for the carrying of the mail to the Williamsburg post office. I think upon that statement of facts the House ought to pass this bill.

Mr. SISSON. When was this service rendered? Mr. FRENCH. From August 6, 1900, to June 30, 1902. I

Mr. FRENCH. From August of the Congresses—
Mr. SISSON. That was 11 years ago.
Mr. FRENCH. Yes. I presented a bill on that subject to the Congress before, but this is the first time it has been reported from the committee.

Mr. SISSON. How many times has it been before a committee of this House?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not know. I probably should have presented it in every Congress since it was called to my attention. Mr. Williams tried to recover from the department. good deal of correspondence between him and the department. Finally he became convinced that he could not recover even the amount that was due Lee Carter. The department advised me that without any authority of Congress they were willing to pay the amount that was due Lee Carter if he could be found, but we could not locate him, and after spending a good deal of time in trying to locate him, and Mr. Williams not being able to do so, it finally seemed advisable to ask Congress to compensate Mr. Williams in this way.

Mr. SISSON. Can the gentleman tell how many people got mail at this post office?

Mr. FRENCH. I do not know. The receipts of the office have already been stated.

Mr. SISSON. They would indicate that the office was established for the convenience of Mr. Williams, the merchant there, rather than for the convenience of others.

Mr. FRENCH. Not at all. Mr. SISSON. Why should Williams have paid out of his own pocket $25 a month to the carrier?

Mr. FRENCH. Because he had no doubt that the Government would compensate him and supposed he was authorized to employ the carrier, and that he was employing him at a very reasonable compensation, less than $2 per trip, and he expected the contract to be awarded at any time. The very fact that the Government did receive bids of between $400 and $450 a year for the carrying of the mail, but rejected them, suggests that Mr. Williams was well within prudence in paying $300 a year, if it had not been for the policy of the department to pay no more than two-thirds of the compensation of the postmaster.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FRENCH. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understood your reply to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Sisson], you stated that the department was willing to pay Mr. Carter, the mail messenger, if he could have been found?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes. Mr. STAFFORD. What did Mr. Carter have coming to him from the Government if Mr. Williams had already paid him the $25 a month?

He had absolutely nothing, because Mr. Mr. FRENCH. Williams had paid him not only the amount that the Government was willing to pay, upon the basis of two-thirds of the salary of the postmaster, but had paid him several times that amount; or, in other words, upon the basis of $25 a month.

Mr. STAFFORD. If Mr. Carter had been paid as an employee of the postmaster, what claim had Mr. Carter against the National Government?

Mr. FRENCH. Only that he was the one to whom the Government could technically pay the money.

Mr. STAFFORD. Pay how much?

Mr. FRENCH. The amount of two-thirds of the postmaster's salary.

Mr. STAFFORD. He had already received it from the postmaster, and much more. So, how did Mr. Carter have a claim against the Post Office Department?

Mr. FRENCH. It had not cost the Government anything. The Government had not paid two-thirds of the salary of the postmaster, either to Carter or to Williams, for this service.

Mr. STAFFORD. But I understand that if Mr. Carter could be found now, he could put in a claim for two-thirds of the postmaster's salary.

Mr. FRENCH. He could put in a claim, but, of course, the money appropriated for that purpose has lapsed, and it would require an act of Congress to authorize the department to pay even that amount to Carter.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is all Mr. Carter would have a claim against the Government for, merely two-thirds of the salary of the postmaster?

Mr. FRENCH. His legal claim would be represented by two-thirds of the salary of the postmaster.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman know how much twothirds of the salary of the postmaster at that time would be?

Mr. FRENCH. Approximately.

Mr. MANN. The salary of the postmaster was $70.75. Mr. STAFFORD. It was $64.04 for the period for which he was carrying the mail.

Mr. FRENCH. The compensation of the postmaster was $64.04.

Mr. STAFFORD. Upon that basis the amount that would be due to Mr. Carter would be two-thirds of that. Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The compensation of the postmaster was $70.75. The gentleman is reading from the wrong place.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; that is right, $70.75.
Mr. STAFFORD. I will direct the gentleman's attention to the fact that the report of Dr. C. P. Granfield, Acting Postmaster General, shows that for the period during which service was performed by Lee Carter, from January 1, 1901, to June 30, 1902, the salary of the postmaster was $64.04. That is stated on page 2 of the report.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman skips a line in reading.

Mr. STAFFORD. I read the other line. I did not skip anything.

Mr. MANN. The compensation of the postmaster for the entire period from August 6, 1900, to June 30, 1902, was $70.75, and for the period during which service was performed by Lee Carter, from January 1, 1900, to June 30, 1902, was $60.04, but the postmaster performed service for the entire period.

Mr. STAFFORD. Lee Carter performed service for a part of the time.

Mr. MANN. The postmaster performed service for the entire

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.
Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FRENCH. With pleasure.
Mr. SISSON. Why did not the carrier collect whatever was due him from the Government?

Mr. FRENCH. He supposed his dealings were with the postmaster and he was fully satisfied; he was fully compensated. Mr. SISSON. Why did not the postmaster, every quarter, put in his claim for whatever amount he had paid to Carter?

Mr. FRENCH. If he had done that, he would have discovered the mistake he was laboring under, but he was expecting that the contract would be awarded at any time and the settlement would be made by the Government with him.

Mr. SISSON. It seems to me that if a person wants to establish a mail route and the Government declined to take the star route or the rural carrier, if the merchant continues to pay the salary to the carrier and then the Government pays him, that would be a bad precedent.

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, no; under the statement the gentleman makes it ought to be done at the merchant's risk.

Mr. SISSON. Is it not true that he wanted it for his own benefit, and that he should assume all the risk?

Mr. FRENCH. No; he was laboring under what he thought he had authority to do, in doing what he did.

Mr. SISSON. If that was true, why did not he collect what was coming from the Government each quarter?

Mr. FRENCH. He ought to have done so. Mr. SISSON. It seems he had judgment enough to attend to the post office. He evidently knew the postmaster's duties and what it would necessitate to keep the accounts of the amount of postage which he canceled, and so forth. Knowing that, and the fact that he was paying $25 a month out of his own pocket, he ought not to have continued all that time without an investigation.

Mr. FRENCH. I think he ought to have made an investigation; but the very fact that he did not, but continued to pay the carrier, shows conclusively that he did not know the facts and was laboring under an erroneous notion.

Mr. SISSON. Does it not show that he had to have the service in the business, and he continued and took the chance of paying the carrier himself? Is not that the conclusion?

Mr. FRENCH. Not at all. The fact is the department ought to have awarded the contract a year or a year and a half before it did. If it had awarded the contract on the basis of a reasonable wage to be paid to the carrier, this would not have been necessary. Williams was not expecting that this matter would necessary. run month after month for nearly two years, but that the contract would be awarded after the first bids had gone in, and then after the second bids had gone in; and the fact that the bids went in on the basis of $400 or $450 a year shows that the postmaster was paying a reasonable compensation.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Has the post office there been abandoned since Carter quit carrying the mail?

Mr. FRENCH. I suppose it is there now. I have had no occasion to inquire into it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. The contract was afterwards let for the carrying of the mail?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes; on the basis of $174 per annum.

Mr. LAFFERTY. How long did that continue, if you know? Mr. FRENCH. Their contracts are usually awarded for a period of four years, and I assume that that was the case here. The committee cut down the bill and said, "We will not compensate Mr. Williams for all he has paid out, but we are willing to compensate him for the amount for which the contract was awarded."

Mr. LAFFERTY. The gentleman has no knowledge that it has discontinued the Williams post office?

Mr. FRENCH. No; and if it was, that would not modify the facts in this case. The services were performed and paid for at the time.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Is it not true that the department never establishes a post office for the convenience of a merchant, but that it is confined to patrons and their convenience throughout the route?

Mr. FRENCH. Oh, I do not assume that anyone took seriously the remark that it was for the accommodation of Mr. Williams for a minute.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. COX. I think I read the gentleman's bill and the report of the committee on it. If I remember correctly, the Assistant Postmaster General, Dr. Grandfield, said that the amount which could be allowed under conditions such as this claimant is seeking to recover for now would be a sum equal to two-thirds of Mr. COX. How would that compare with the amount that is allowed in this bill? Mr. FRENCH. Oh, that would only be two-thirds of $70.75, or something like $47.

Mr. COX. If I understood the gentleman's case when I read the bill and report, under the law, as it existed at that time and as it exists to-day, the only amount which the postmaster would have been justified in paying the carrier would have been two-thirds of the postmaster's salary.

Mr. FRENCH. That is all he was authorized under the law and the department to pay. The postmaster evidently misun-derstood the authorization, because the department insists that the authorization was the usual one and is the authorization given to other postmasters.

Mr. COX. That was the law at that time?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. COX. And is the law to-day.
Mr. FRENCH. Yes.
Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. FRENCH. Certainly.
Mr. MILLER. Does the gentleman think a party could have been secured to carry that mail for two-thirds of the postmaster's salary?

Mr. FRENCH. Not at all, as I have repeatedly stated; as the bids went in they were $400 or $450.

Mr. MILLER. Where a postmaster is authorized to contract for carrying the mail, was there any possible way by which he could know what his annual salary would be?

Mr. FRENCH. None at all. He would have to figure on the small basis of a few days' service.

Mr. MANN. He knew how many letters he wrote in his business, if he knew anything.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman inform the committee when bids for the star-route service were first advertised for?

Mr. FRENCH. I believe the department does not indicate the date. There is no stated time of the department when the route was advertised or the bids called for.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has stated several times that the department made several efforts to have this contract awarded to some carrier, but because of the price they refused. I am curious to ascertain how many and how frequently after the establishment of the office such efforts were made. I think there were two.

Mr. STAFFORD. Because the carrier employed by the postmaster was engaged in this service nearly two years.

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. There seems to have been laches somewhere in not awarding this contract before the date it was awarded to a regular carrier.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Williams in his affidavit says that during that period there were two bids proposed. At one time he states that the lowest bid was in the amount of $400 and the The bids that were offered were in the amounts of $400 and $450, and I submit that that amount is reasonable compensation for making a trip three days a week a distance of

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman inform the committee whether after the department received those bids there was any consideration given by the department to the abolishment of this small office that only brought in a return sufficient to pay the postmaster his meager salary, for the salary of $70 during this period would be taken entirely by the postmaster, and nothing would remain for the Government for its part of the service?

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I would not suppose the Government would think of discontinuing the office. The fact of the business is there are thousands and thousands of offices scattered throughout the country that do not pay as much compensation to the postmasters as has been suggested was paid to the postmaster in that office.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would not want to take the gentleman's statement that there were thousands and thousands of post offices that pay less than $70 for a two-year period. I think there are rare cases, but not thousands and thousands.

Mr. FRENCH. It may not be that there are as many as I think, but I think the gentleman will find that in all the western country the history of the small post office and the history of the development of that country is that post offices are maintained as means of building up the country, of drawing people to those settlements, and that it is necessary in innumerable instances, and I think thousands and thousands-unless the gentleman pin it down to this particular moment-of fourthclass post offices have been conducted for as long a period of time as I suggest here without any greater compensation than was paid to the postmaster at Williamsburg.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was the condition, I may say to the gentleman, prior to the establishment of the rural-carrier service, but upon the establishment of the rural-carrier service, up to date, some thirty or forty thousand fourth-class post offices have been discontinued. I recognize that in the western country, where rural-carrier service is not feasible and where the people must be served by the star-route service, the star-route carriers perform a service similar to the rural carrier, and these post offices are matters of convenience and necessity, and to that country the remarks of the gentleman are pertinent.

Mr. FRENCH. And the people there are very glad to abandon the smaller post offices for the rural routes, and are praying for the time when they may have the whole western country connected up by rural routes the same as in the more thickly populated counties of probably the gentleman's State.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman brings up a live subject, and I do not wish to go at length into that phase of it; but I would like to have the gentleman's opinion why, though the star-route service is of the same character as the rural-route service, the people in the western country favor the rural service over the star route?

Mr. FRENCH. Just a word on that point, although it is not pertinent to this bill. The star-route carrier usually follows the same route in returning that he takes in going from the office. A rural-route carrier has his route laid out with respect to settlement. The star-route carrier has his route laid out with respect to the contract price or the nearest distance between offices to be served, and upon that basis he serves not the greatest number but those merely along the road.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a word more. I stated a while ago that the postmaster in these fourth-class post offices gets 60 per cent of the receipts of his office, but my recollection now is that he gets the entire amount up to $50 a year, so that here we are presented with a proposition where a man wants a post office mainly for his own convenience, where he gets all of the money that is received, is authorized to pay two-thirds more in order to have the mail brought to his office, where before he had to go after it himself, and then, in addition, wants the Government to pay him a considerable sum over what is authorized by law. I am not entirely unfamiliar with claims in reference to matters somewhat similar to this. If this bill only were to be passed and there were no other claims like it, I would not waste the time of the House to call attention to it, but there are thousands of claims now or would be thousands of claims of similar cases where post offices have been established in a new neighborhood for the convenience of the people there, including the man who kept the store and who is made the postmaster, where they have been told the terms upon which the office could be established, so that they have known that they would have to pay for the bringing of the mail to and from the railroad, in the main, out of their own pocket. That seems like a very unfair thing on the part of the Government on the one side. I presented in the House the other day a proposition to permit a slight increase in accordance with promises which have been made by the Post Office Department to clerks in charge of substations in cities, which the House very generously voted down through the assistance of gentlemen coming from districts where they have fourth-class post offices, and we were told in the House why these substations are established, that they bring business to the drug stores where they have the sub-I have known cases where a man received $50 a year from the Government to maintain a substation, and where he paid out more than $500 a year for extra clerk hire in order to do the business of the Government. Undoubtedly if it had not brought him business, he would not do that. I do not think it is just, but it is certainly more just to increase that man's salary where the department has promised to increase it when his business increased than it is to pay a claim like this where the office was established, notwithstanding the facetious view of that matter by my distinguished friend from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], for the convenience and profit of the storekeeper who took the office.

A man who establishes a post office at his store brings the people from the surrounding country to his store, where before they drove a little farther to a store at the railroad. He has the office there, it is true, for their convenience; also for his convenience and for his profit. When the Government pays him what it has agreed to pay it treats him far better than the clerk in charge of a substation in the city, because in no case in recent years has the Government paid the clerk what it has agreed to pay as the business increased.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL

[Mr. MONDELL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, just another word. I realize the force of the parallel case that the gentleman from Wyoming has drawn—the case of the widow who paid the carrier for this service. On the other hand, the other illustration that the gentleman used, where a sum of money aggregating some $1,400 was raised by the community, has no significance in connection with this case, but is parallel with very many cases throughout the West.

In my State post offices are established, and before the department will recognize as reasonable a bid that may be offered, possibly many months pass by and numerous bids are called for. I myself have been one of the patrons of a small country post office to take my turn in carrying the mail from the nearest post office supplying this branch office.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Mr. FRENCH. Certainly.

What real difference is there between con-Mr. MONDELL. cributions by all of the patrons of an office toward carrying the mail and a contribution made by the postmaster himself, who may be a very considerable beneficiary in the establishment and maintenance of the office if he be a storekeeper?

Mr. FRENCH. I would think that the difference would be ery plain. All the members of this community, for instance, in which I lived, although exceedingly anxious to receive regular carrier service and to have the bids awarded at the earliest possible time, were quite willing to donate their time and their horses and bear the expenses necessary in the carrying of the mail. But, on the other hand, there is a great deal of difference between the service that was performed by the members of that community, who were patrons of the office and were con-tributing to the fund that went to a definite carrier, as is sometimes done, and the contributing of that much money by one man to secure his time and horses and to defray the expense of carrying the mail to the post office. In the other instance the entire expense has fallen upon the shoulders of one man, who, under misapprehension of what the law was, employed a carrier at far less than the amount that the two bids indicated was a reasonable amount that should have been paid to the car-

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes. Mr. MONDELL. If this bill passes, does it or does it not afford an excuse for every postmaster at an office hereafter to be established for saying that he or she did not understand these instructions, did not understand what they meant, and then proceeding to hire a carrier and then coming here with a claim?

Mr. FRENCH. Not at all.
Mr. MONDELL. Why not?
Mr. FRENCH. On the contrary, it ought to make it plain to the department that it should furnish very specific instructions to the postmaster. You can not get a copy of the order or the authorization that was made to this postmaster. They can not prove that they did not give him the authorization that he claims. They say merely they assume that they did not. He says they did. They deny it.

Mr. MONDELL. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's claim, but I think we ought to understand what this is. It is not an isolated case. There are many other cases like it. There is a blank that the department sends out with that joker on it about "two-thirds of the salary of the postmaster." postmasters pay no attention to it, because it is so insignificant that it is not worth paying attention to, and they make such provision as they can. There is a printed circular sent out, and I have half a dozen of these cases where I have asked the postmaster to furnish me with the instructions received, and wherever I have been able to get them at all they have proven to be that same printed circular.

Mr. FRENCH. Very likely so; and, as I said a while ago, I assumed that it was this printed circular that was sent to this

Mr. MONDELL. And that printed circular authorizes the postmaster to pay two-thirds of his salary, and no more.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Certainly. Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I simply wanted to ask by what computation a postmaster could arrive at any basis for making an offer to the carrier under those circumstances?

Mr. MONDELL. All that he can say is, "I am canceling about a dozen, or 2 dozen, or 3 dozen, or half a dozen letters a day now, and I expect to cancel more or less hereafter." He can not say absolutely. Of course that is impossible.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Government puts out a statement, then, that is absolutely impossible to carry out on the face of it, because there is no salary fixed.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman will understand this, that no one has fought more earnestly for a good rural service than I have since I have been here, and no one has said more than I have against what I consider to be the parsimonious action of the department in these cases. But this fact must not be lost sight of: The Government is not getting anything out of this service. The postmaster gets all that there is in it, so far as the mail that originates at the office is concerned; and then the postmaster pays two-thirds of the salary to the carrier, and as soon as you can show any considerable amount of business in the office they establish one of these rural lines, once a week, twice a week, or three times a week, or daily, increasing as the business

If there is any fault in this matter, the fault is ours. It is in the law. It is not a regulation of the department. It is a law, and the Post Office Department simply issues a circular stating the law and informing the postmaster that that is what he has authority to do. Sometimes the postmasters misunderstand it; at least they say they do, and I think that in some cases they do. But if we pay one case of this kind we ought to pay them all, in my opinion. So far as I am concerned, I shall be de-lighted to have some cases paid that I know of that are very meritorious. Possibly we should change the law.

Mr. FRENCH. Of course, the gentleman is aware, however, of the fact that the very maintenance of such communities as have such small offices as do not pay even the running expenses of the office—the very maintenance of such offices as that is what enables the business in the larger cities along postal lines to be such that the revenues there can largely exceed even the cost of maintaining the offices, such as those in New York and Chicago and Philadelphia.

Mr. MONDELL. I think I have stated words to that effect on this floor more frequently perhaps than any man except the gentleman from Idaho, because I have reiterated that a great But I do not want to say anything against the many times. gentleman's bill as a specific proposition.

Mr. FRENCH. I appreciate the gentleman's support. I appreciate that. [Laughter.]
Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Idaho want more support like that? [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I want to make this suggestion-and the gentleman forces me to it-that it seems extraordinary that a man who has sagacity enough to run a country grocery store could not learn within two years that he was doing something that the law did not authorize him to do. It is extraordinary to me that at some time within these two years he did not appeal somewhere to learn where he was going to get hi.. money back.

Mr. FRENCH. He believed in the Government.
Mr. MONDELL. He had a vast amount of confidence—rather more confidence than judgment, I should say.

Mr. FRENCH. Then, gentlemen, I shall be glad to have the support of those who favor the bill for the reasons for which I favor it and the support of those who favor it for the reasons advanced by the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MANN. Let the bill be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That $1,000, or so much thereof as may be found due the claimant, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of T. S. Williams on account of services rendered as mail carrier to Williamsburg, Idaho, from January 1, 1901, to June 30, 1902, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay over whatever amount that may be due T. S. Williams as stated by the Postmaster General.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to T. S. Williams the sum of $315.55, in full compensation for payments made by the said T. S. Williams to secure the service of a mail carrier from August 6, 1900, to June 30, 1902, at Williamsburg, Idaho."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, I am quite willing to vote for the original bill introduced by the gentleman from Idaho, which proposes to pay this man the amount found due him by the Postmaster General. Just why the com-mittee puts in an amendment directing that he shall be paid a specific amount I do not know, and I shall ask for a division on the amendment, hoping that it may be defeated and the original bill passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 25, noes 6.

Accordingly the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

COL. ALFRED C. SHARPE.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I call up next No. 30 on the Private Calendar, the bill (H. R. 10232) for the relief of Col. Alfred C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Col. Alfred C. Sharpe, United States Army, the sum of $44, the same being for horse hired by him for use while on duty with the Organized Militia of Ohio.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, this bill is more for the purpose of clearing this Army officer's record than for the payment of this money. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Morr] has charge of the bill, but in his absence I will make a brief explanation in lieu of the one which he was expected to make.

I have been informed that Col. Sharpe has an unblemished record. As the matter now stands, this one unadjusted account stands against that record. He was directed to hire a horse, and he did hire a horse and paid $44 out of his own pocket. After being directed by his superior officer to do this, the department refused to allow his account for the $44, and the matter stands in that way.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Assistant Secretary of War to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Morr] on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the letter to which he refers. Is there objection?

There was no objection. The letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 3, 1914.

Hon. LUTHER W. MOTT, House of Representatives. Siz: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 19th instant inclosing copy of H. R. 10232, providing for the payment of $44 to Col. Alfred C. Sharpe, United States Army, to cover the hire of horse used by that officer while on duty as inspector-instructor with the Organized Militia of Ohio.

It appears from the records of the War Department that, in compliance with Col. Sharpe's request, the $44 involved was paid by the Quartermaster's Department for the hire of a horse for two months at the rate of $22 per month.

On April 10 the request of Col. Sharpe for an extension of two months to the privilege of hiring a horse, effective about April 15, was approved; but on April 26, 1912, this authority was canceled by telegraph, due to the fact that, in the meantime, the quartermaster's first monthly account for $22 had been suspended by the Auditor for the War Department as not a proper charge against the United States, that official holding that Col. Sharpe's duty was not such as to require him to be mounted, and even had this been the case, he should have provided his own mount.

On June 11, 1912, Col. Sharpe, who had refunded to the quartermaster at Columbus Barracks, Ohio, $44, pending final advices from The Adjutant General's Office, requested information as to whether this expense should be borne by him or by the Government. In reply he was informed that, in view of the suspension by the Auditor for the War Department, no action could be taken to authorize the hire of the horse which had been used by him as indicated above.

As it appears from the preceding that the department erred in the first instance when it approved Col. Sharpe's original request for the hire of a horse at the rate of $22 per month, and that this officer, acting under such approval, actually expended the amount involved in connection with the performance of a duty assigned him by the department, favorable consideration of H. R. 10232 is recommended.

Very respectfully,

HENRY BRECKINRIDGE, Assistant Secretary of War.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill for amend-

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation. The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise, and report to the House bills from the Private Calendar Nos. 13, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 30, with the recommendation that they do pass.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, may I not in all earnestness suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that he withhold that motion for a few moments? I know the gentleman does not intend that all of to-day, which has been set apart for the consideration of private bills, be occupied exclusively by his committee

Mr. POU. I am perfectly willing to withhold the motion.
Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I believe the regular order under the rule will be now to call the Private Calendar on other claim bills, from the War Claims Committee, for example.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. War claims bills are not in order to-day at all.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I was under the impression that this day was given up to the consideration of bills of this nature from the two Claims Committees.

Mr. MANN. On the next day when claims are considered at all, war-claim bills will have the preference; so the gentleman's bill, being at the top of the list, will be considered.

Mr. SLAYDEN. 't is such a meritorious bill that I expect even my distinguished friend from Illinois will speak in favor of it.

Mr. MANN. I should not be surprised. I might take an hour on it.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, at the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] I withhold my motion.

Mr. MANN. No. 9 on the Private Calendar is the next bill.

EDWARD B. KELLEY.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 6939) to reimburse Edward B. Kelley for moneys expended while superintendent of the Rose-bud Indian Agency in South Dakota, as follows:

bud Indian Agency in South Dakota, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of ray moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,281,20 to reimburse Edward B. Kelley, formerly superintendent of the Rossoud Indian Agency in South Dakota, for moneys expended for costs and expenses in a suit brought against him by one H. A. Bloom, involving the property of an Indian, a member of the Pine Ridge Sloux Tribe, and for the payment of a judgment entered against him in said suit: Provided, That before any part of the amount herein appropriated is paid to the said Elward B. Kelley there shall be filed a duly attested certificate of the clerk of the court in which the judgment was entered showing that said judgment has been fully paid and satisfied: And provided further, That the said Edward B. Kelley shall file a receipt in full of all claims or demands against the United States or any Indian by reason of the moneys expended in connection with the suit herein referred to.

With the fallowing committee amendment:

With the following committee amendment:

In line 4, page 1, strike out "$1,281.20" and insert in lieu thereof

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move the adoption of the committee amendment.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I want some explanation of this bill.

Mr. MILLER. I shall be very pleased to make an explana-tion. It seems that on the Rosebud Indian Reservation in South Dakota a pair of horses belonging to an Indian woman were The Indian agent who had charge of the reservation occupied by the tribe of which this woman was a member was very active in the performance of his duty to regain possession of the horses and prosecute the thieves. He was successful in both respects. Two men were apprehended-a man named DeMarsche and a man named Monteau. Both were prosecuted in the Federal court. One was acquitted and the other found guilty and sentenced to the State penitentiary, where he now is. The horses were recovered and given into the possession of the Indian woman. Thereafter, to the surprise of nearly everyone, a man named Bloom, who resided in that part of the State, appeared and claimed that the horses did not belong to the Indian woman, but belonged to him. He brought suit against the Indian agent and against the Indian woman as defendants, and, as an instance of the remarkable uncertainty of jury trials, he actually recovered a verdict in that particular county. The committee will understand that the suit was tried in one of the circuit courts of the State of South Dakota.

When this man Bloom first began the suit a report was made by the Indian agent to the Indian Office. Authority was given by the Indian Office to the district attorney for the Federal Government in the State of South Dakota to defend the action, which he did. Receiving ample authority from the Attorney General, he conducted the defense of the case and subpænaed witnesses. Many of them had to be experts, because the question of the particular brand on the horses was involved. While a man is serving time now for stealing the horses from the Indian woman to whom they undoubtedly belonged, yet unfortunately, as a matter of fact, this man Bloom did recover a judgment, and the amount mentioned in this bill is the amount of the judgment against the Indian agent and the amount of the expenses which the United States district attorney incurred in defending the suit.

Mr. COX. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this man was actually directed by the Indian Department here to go in and defend the suit?

Mr. MILLER. He was; and, although he did so strictly in the performance of a public duty, he has not been reimbursed. Mr. COX. Why has he not been reimbursed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs here in Washington?

Mr. MILLER. The report throws some light on that, or, if it does not, the letter of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs at that time does. It appears that after they had gone into this the Commissioner of Indian Affairs found that he had no funds out of which to pay these expenses. The first letter, dated 1910, says, at the close, that when the funds are available appropriation will be made to pay the sum; but they have no funds.

The bill was read for amendment.

The Clerk read the following amendment:

Line 4, strike out the figures "$1,281.20" and insert the figures

The amendment was agreed to.
Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill as amended be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

J. A. MATHENY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2733) authorizing J. A. Matheny, of Colony, Wyo., to make homestead entry.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas J. A. Matheny, of Colony, Wyo., did in March, 1911, purchase from one Ralph Miller for a valuable consideration the lands hereinafter described; and Whereas the said J. A. Matheny has made the said tract his home and placed valuable improvements thereon; and Whereas the said J. A. Matheny is likely to lose the said tract including the money he paid therefor and the improvements made thereon by reason of the cancellation of the entry of Floyd Compton, from whom the said Ralph Miller purchased the tract: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That J. A. Matheny, of Colony, Wyo., be, and he is hereby, authorized to make homestead entry embracing the south half of the southwest quarter, the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter, and the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter of section 20, township 56 north, range 61 west of the sixth principal meridian in Wyoming, and to secure title to the same upon satisfactory proof of compliance with the provisions of the homestead laws.

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, there is no general debate, and I ask that the amendments be now put.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, page 2, after the word "Wyoming," insert the words "after Floyd Compton's entry therefor shall have been canceled." Strike out the preamble.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill as amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask a parliamentary question. The next bill on the calendar is the bill which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] desired to call up a few moments ago.

Mr. MANN. That is not in order to-day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is a question I wanted It does not have preference, but whether or not under the rule it would come up is a question. I am inclined to think it would. It would not have any preference over other claims, but in its regular order on the calendar I think it would come up.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to a ruling of that sort. I am willing that these bills should be absolutely squelched. You may get two or three up to-day, but you will not get any more up this session. Certainly not, if you get a ruling that such bills are in order to-day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I will not ask for a ruling, as the gentleman from Texas has left the Hall, evidently satisfied with the matter as it is.

HUGH P. STRONG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1262) for the relief of Hugh P. Strong.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Hugh P. Strong, of Superior, Wis., be, and he hereby is, given the right within two years after the passage of this act to select, make entry, and file upon any 160 acres of Government land, subject to homestead entry; that upon proof of said Hugh P. Strong having established his residence upon said new entry, patent for the same shall be issued to him in accordance with the general homestead laws, but without the necessity of maintaining residence and cultivation on the same for five years, or filing proof of the same as required by the said laws, for the reason that said Hugh P. Strong duly made homestead entry No. 2096, upon which patent was issued by the United States Government to said Hugh P. Strong on January 19, 1898, but which patent was canceled by the Supreme Court of the State of Minnesota on December 11, 1903, and later by the Supreme Court of the United States on October 29, 1906.

to make homestead entry. H. R. 1262. A bill for the relief of Hugh P. Strong.

The following bills on the Private Calendar, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, were severally considered, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, were read the third time, and passed.

H. R. 10345. A bill for the relief of C. M. Hammond. H. R. 10763. A bill for the relief of Dr. L. W. Culbreath. H. R. 10232. A bill for the relief of Col. Alfred C. Sharpe.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA DAY.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the late Representative Bremner who died yesterday, and who is to be buried on Monday next, was a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia. Under the rules of the House, Monday next, February 9, 1914, is District day. As many members of the committee desire to attend his funeral I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Monday next be transferred from Monday until Thursday, February 12, 1914.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, of course no one will object to that request, but may I get from the gentlemen on that side what is likely to be done in the House to-morrow and on Monday. When we passed the rule providing for the debate on the good roads bill, the expectation was that the Indian appropriation bill, which is on the calendar, would be called up after we got through with claims to-day. I understand that proposition is off. I do not know whether they are ready to go ahead on

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think they will be. I regret we will not be able to take up the Indian appropriation bill to-morrow, but I think there is some business on the Speaker's table that will take an hour or two, which we may be able to dispose of by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Then why not to-night agree that after the business on the Speaker's table is disposed of to-morrow we shall proceed with general debate on the good roads bill, instead of having a session for general debate to-morrow night?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. There is no objection to that on my

That would be agreeable to me. part.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would much prefer to push an appropriation bill at this time.

Yes; if one were ready we all would.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As we have not one in hand, then I will submit a unanimous request to that effect.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will first put the request of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the business in order Monday next be transferred to Thursday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table to-morrow, the order making the good-roads bill in order for to-night and to-morrow, may continue during the day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that after the business on the Speaker's table is disposed of to-morrow, the general debate on the good-roads bill shall be then in order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR EVENING SESSION.

The Chair appointed Mr. RAINEY to preside as Speaker pro tempore at the evening session.

RECESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, under the order heretofore made, I ask unanimous consent that the House now stand in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? There was no objection; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 26 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 8 o'clock p. m.) was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. RAINEY].

RURAL POST ROADS.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11686) to provide that the United States shall, in certain cases, aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 11686, with Mr. Rubey in the chair.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, in as much as I wish to make a request as to controlling debate, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. Rubey, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the House had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11686, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask unanimous consent that general debate upon this subject be controlled half on this side by myself and half on the other side by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Prouty].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Shackleford] asks unanimous consent that the time allotted for debate on this bill under the rule shall be controlled half by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Shackleford] and half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Prouty]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11686, the rural post roads bill, with Mr. Rubey in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11686) to provide that the United States shall, in certain cases, aid the States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural post roads.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Shack-LEFORD] asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Mr. SHACKLEFORD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF].

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, during the past 20 years the subject of transportation has become almost paramount to all others in the minds of the real students of economics of the Nation and the world. Indeed, this subject has been one that has commanded the attention of the best minds of all ages.

Even our barbarian forefathers recognized the importance of easy routes of transportation and travel. This is evidenced by the fact that to-day can be seen in many of our early settled States trails used centuries ago by the various Indian tribes of the country. These trails can readily be followed for miles through valleys and over mountains. In the softer ground they have been worn down until they resemble narrow ditches, while in many places, on solid rock, the countless thousands of moc-casined feet that passed over them in centuries gone by have worn a trail that time will never efface.

The Indian had his regular routes of travel just as surely as do the people of to-day. If he wished to go to the hunting grounds to provide food for the tribe or the family, if he wished to visit some friendly neighboring tribe, or if he wished to engage in war with some other nation 100 or 1,000 miles away, there was his intelligently selected, well-beaten path or road over which he could travel with little inconvenience to himself or his party.

This was not only true of the North American Indian, but true of all other uncivilized tribes as well. With the dawn of civilization and improvement in the methods of transportation, it became apparent that for easier communication, socially and commercially, something more was necessary than a mere path through the wilderness. And this marked the beginning of the actual building of roads.

History tells us that the Romans were the first to really appreciate the importance of building good roads. They were the first to enter largely upon this work. As fast as cities or nations were conquered roads were laid out and built to connect the same with Rome and with each other, until when she was at the height of her power every city in the Empire was connected by a great network of permanent stone roads. They began building roads on a large scale 400 years before Christ, and for 600 years were known as a nation of superb road builders. Their greatest road, the Appian Way, 100 Italian miles long, was begun in the year 312 B. C., and was for 800 years in perfect condition. Portions of it remain and are easily traced to this day.

The first process in the forming of these roads was to lay out the course they were to take, which was invariably carried in as straight a line as the nature of the country would permit. The soil was then excavated to procure a solid foundation, and when the nature of the earth was such as to preclude this the conditions were remedied by the driving of piles. The sides of the roadway were then flanked by two strong walls, which served as a support to the road. The excavated space was filled up with various layers of stone cemented together. On top of this a layer of cement was placed, and in this soft substance large flat stones closely united were laid. When the cement had hardened they had a road which, for all purposes, was as good as one carved out of solid rock.

Upon conquering England they found it impracticable in many instances to construct roads of stone and used the next best available material, which proved to be gravel. Instead of placing a bed of this material 8 or 12 inches thick upon their roadway, as is done to-day, they built it to a height of 3 feet o more, and even now, after more than 15 centuries, these roads can be easily traced throughout all England.

"Necessity is the mother of invention," and the thing that prompted the Romans to build these great permanent highways throughout all their domain was military necessity. They found it necessary to move their armies readily and rapidly, and in order to accomplish this with expedition, and to meet their needs in the centuries to come, they built not a temporary roadway, but one that would last for ages. It had not entered their minds that there would ever be any other method of transportation than that then in use, and consequently they builded in such a way as would give them easy means of transporting their armies, munitions of war, and provisions as rapidly as could be done with the means at hand.

This was the necessity that first prompted Napoleon to enter into the building of the great system of highways that France has to-day. It was as necessary for him to move his armies quickly as it was for the Romans, and he early recognized this necessity and established everywhere throughout the French Empire a like network of permanent roads.

Since the year 1900 the people of the entire United States have entered into a movement for the establishment throughout the country of good roads. Since this date the more wealthy States of the Union have made great strides in the improvement of their rural highways. The movement in the poor and more sparsely settled communities has not up to this time gained any material headway. The farmers until recently have been more or less satisfied to continue year after year, in good weather and bad, the transportation of their produce over roads that were sometimes good, often indifferent, and usually bad. But of late, as a result of the study of conditions in other more fortunate localities, through the interchange of ideas at the grange meetings, and so forth, the farmer has come to realize that when he is compelled to draw a ton or a half ton of produce to the market at a load where he might as well draw two or three tons, he is thereby increasing his cost of production to the amount it costs him to make these extra trips to market and thereby lessening his power to compete with his more fortunate brethren.

The question of transportation has been an important one since the dawn of civilization, and the evolution in the method and means of transportation has been wonderful, indeed. Until the end of time, in all probability, there will be but three means of transportation, namely, railroads, waterways, and roadways. These methods are dependent one upon the other. The railroad can not live without the road vehicle and the great ships that traverse the seas and waterways could not continue to exist profitably without railroads and road vehicles. Neither one of the three could perform its full function in the development of our Nation if it were not for each of the others. Each has an important and independent work to perform in intrastate, inter-state, and foreign commerce. Two of the great systems of transportation—the railroads and water-craft lines—have been developed by private capital and are operated for private gain. The third—transportation by road vehicle over public high-ways—is in the hands of the people, and the common use is ac-corded to all free of charge. Those of us who have failed to give the question of transportation and its consequential tax upon the people some degree of thought do not or can not realize how great the burden is that is now carried by the people from this source. The amount of money it costs to transport the necessaries of life and the other articles of commerce over the public roads, the railroads, and over the waterways is a direct tax upon the producing and the consuming public.

We complain of the ever-increasing expenditure of the public funds, realizing that every dollar so expended is a direct tax upon the consuming public. These are expenditures that are tangible-that can be seen.

The principal sources from which the Government derives its funds are the tariff and the internal revenue. The tariff tax for the past year under the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was $3.65 per capita, and the internal-revenue tax was $3.72 per capita, making a total of $7.37 per capita. The transportation tax of the railroads for the past year has been $33.24 per capita, the water-transportation tax has been $5 per capita, and the wagontransportation tax for the past year has been $17.39 per capita. making a total transportation tax per capita of $55.63. It is estimated by the Bureau of Roads of the Department of Agriculture that the cost per ton-mile for hauling produce to market is at the present time 23 cents. It is estimated that under present conditions it costs the farmers of this country $1,600,000,000 per annum to haul their produce to market. In countries blessed with a system of improved highways the cost of transportation per ton-mile over the wagon roads is from 9 to 12 cents. When the rural roads of this country shall have been improved to as great an extent as have those in France, for instance, the cost of wagon transportation in this country will have been reduced approximately 50 per cent from what it is to-day. The producing and consuming public will be relieved of this great burden to the extent of approximately $8.50 per capita per annum, a direct saving to the farmers and consumers of the Nation of $800,000,000 per year.

On December 12, 1913, I introduced a bill in this House for the establishment of a bureau of postal highways and the extension of Federal aid in the construction and maintenance of good roads in the several States and Territories and the civil subdivisions thereof. I had given the subject of Federal aid much study and thought and incorporated my ideas in this bill. I believed and I believe now that the Bureau of Roads in the Department of Agriculture should be transferred bodily to the Post Office Department. It seems to me and it seemed to other members of the committee that should the Post Office Department be given control of this particular department of the Government the work of the department itself could be rendered much more efficient and economical.

I provided that a director of the bureau of postal highways should be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; that he should receive a salary of $7,500 per annum; and that he should be a practical engineer of road construction. I provided also that the director of the bureau of postal highways could appoint assistants in the various States and Territories not to exceed 50 in number; that the assistants should be appointed only after competitive examination; and that said inspectors should be removed only for cause. My idea was to take this department of the Government out of the great political spoils system that has made a mockery of our public departments. I believe that when intelligent men have shown their ability in competitive examinations, and when they have put in years at a given work, they must of necessity become much more efficient at that particular line of work than men could possibly be if newly appointed by every incoming administration. I placed the salary these men should receive at $150 per month, having in mind that at certain times of the year the work of inspection, which work was theirs, would be year materially lessened, enabling the director of the bureau to discontinue their services temporarily, and thus effect a saying in the maintenance of the department.

I do not believe it is good policy to turn the Federal moneys over to the several States or civil subdivisions for any purpose whatever unless the Government retains to itself the power to see and to know that this money is being expended as it directs. The duties of the inspectors or assistants to the director were to consist of the inspection of roads after they had been completed, and I believe that had my bill become a law in its entirety, 50 men would have been competent to have handled this work with reasonable expedition.

I have always believed that any local community knows the needs of that particular community better by far than could any State official or any Federal official. I believe that the people themselves in any community should be allowed to say which roads shall be improved and how such roads shall be improved. I have made it possible in my bill for any community anywhere in the several States to so improve their roads as to meet the necessities of that particular community, and I have provided that the people living in a township in any county of any State could improve the roads of that particular township with the materials they have at hand and receive the Federal reward without waiting for the say so of any particular county official or State official. I have investi-gated and attempted to learn the manner of construction and the materials used in the several States throughout this Nation, and in drafting my bill I have separated the different kinds of roads into individual classifications. I attempted to specify how these roads should be built, taking advantage of the ex-periments carried on throughout the country, with a view of making each particular kind of road as good as could reasonably be expected with the materials used. I provided a certain definite reward for each mile of road so constructed, running from $200 per mile for a properly built sand-clay road to $400 per mile for a properly constructed gravel road, $600 per mile for a combination of crushed stone and blast-furnace slag or gravel, and $800 per mile for macadam or other material of equal durability. This was for a 9-foot roadway or track. For each additional foot of width up to and including 16 feet, I had provided for an additional reward of 10 per cent of the original reward. These rewards, however, paid only when the road was completed and built according to specifications. In addition to the reward for construction, I had provided the same rewards for maintenance that the committee bill now before this House provides.

It seems to be that if the Government is going to extend aid to the several States in the building and maintenance of roads, it should extend that aid equally. It should decide upon an equitable and definite amount that should be extended for aid in the construction of certain kinds of roads, and extend to the people in every community this definite sum. For instance, if $25,000,000 is appropriated this year and it is found that this sum is only sufficient to provide for maintenance, and $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 be appropriated next year and the additional $15,000,000 or $25,000,000 be extended as aid in the construction of roads, it seems to me as though an injustice were being worked upon the communities which build their roads the com-

You will readily see that under the provisions of my bill any community would know, before beginning the construction of a mile of road, just the amount it would receive from the Government toward the construction of the same, and this reward would be equal in amount to that extended for a like type of road in every other community, regardless of the year in which it was built.

In initiating legislation along this or other lines, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we should make our start in a way that would insure equal treatment to all, but under the provisions of the bill now before the House equal treatment will depend absolutely upon the amount appropriated by Congress in the years to come. Should the appropriation exceed the $25,000,000 carried in this bill, the communities building roads next year or the years following will receive a larger reward than those building this year. Should the appropriations be less, then the communities building this year will receive more benefit than those which build in the future. I would like to see a system inaugurated by this Government that when worked out to its completion will have paid toward the construction of roads in Bay, Iosco, Crawford, or Ogemaw Counties the same amount per mile for like construction as will have been received by Midland, Mecosta, Isabella, or Clare.

by Midland, Mecosta, Isabella, or Clare.

It is fair also, and it should have been provided in this bill, as it was in mine, that any community which had been progressive enough in the past to build sand, clay, gravel, or macadam roads and properly maintain them should receive the same reward per mile from the Government as those that are to be built in the future. If it is fair to extend aid to a township or a county for roads to be built in the years to come, it is fair also to extend aid in a like amount to those that have constructed and maintained them in the past. It has not been the thought of the committee that the improvement of the rural roads would benefit the farmer alone, but that these benefits would extend to every class of our people indiscriminately, resulting in a very material reduction in the transportation tax that every individual must pay in one way or another. Now, if this is so, and I think every man within the hearing of my voice will agree that it is, will not the roads that have been built prior to this time enter as largely pro rata in the solving of this great economic problem as those that are to be built in the future? If my deductions are right, is it not fair, Mr. Chairman, not only to the communities that have already built their roads, but to every other as well, that rewards should be extended to all alike, regardless as to the particular time the roads are constructed?

Under the provisions of my bill it would have been possible, at an expense to the Government of $1,000,000,000, to improve every road in this country. This seems like a large sum to be expended in any one way, but when we stop to realize that the railroads in the past have received land grants from the Government exceeding in value this immense sum, and that the appropriations for rivers and harbors, including the Panama Canal, already exceeds this sum by more than $100,000,000; that the railroads are being operated as private institutions for private gain, and that while the improvement of rivers and harbors is without question of some general benefit to the people at large, yet the greatest benefit derived therefrom is to the great transportation corporations of the country and the world, and that if $1,000,000,000 is expended in the improvement of the roads of this country it is of direct benefit to all the people, you will readily appreciate how reasonable it was to ask that this sum be expended in the way I have outlined.

I do not believe that this Government should enter into the work of constructing roads. I believe that should be left to the States and the civil subdivisions. I do not believe it is necessary or the proper thing to construct transcontinental boulevards.

For months past an organization known as the National Highways Association has been at great expense to circularize Congress almost weekly with their propaganda for the building of these great national highways. They include beautifully colored maps, with the roadways laid out touching no more than 15 per cent of the counties in each State. They estimate that more than $25,000,000,000 will be spent in the next 25 years on the more than 2,000,000 miles of highways in this country. Their purpose, apparently, is to see to it that any moneys expended for this purpose shall be expended mainly in the interests of the leisure, pleasure-seeking class of the Nation. They argue that the roads should be built partly at the expense of the Government, and that they should take the form of great concrete or macadam boulevards extending across States and across the continent in every direction.

It occurs to me that their interest is mainly in roads that will

It occurs to me that their interest is mainly in roads that will enable automobile owners to drive from State to State rather than in the roads that will enable the farmer to market his produce at a saving to himself and to the consumer. They have circulated pamphlets in which are shown maps of Michigan and Massachusetts. The former bears the title, "Roads beginning nowhere, ending nowhere"; the latter, "Roads beginning somewhere, ending somewhere." They have evidently gotten possession of a map issued at some time in the past by the State highway department of Michigan, showing thereon the roads that had at that time received the State reward. In no instance do I find on this map where the roads constructed under the State reward system have been extended from the county seat to the county lines, with the exception of one road in Wayne County.

I would like to call the attention of the gentlemen responsible for the circulation of this map to the fact that in my county, the county of Bay, there are at this time five distinct macadam roads leading from Bay City, the county seat, straight through to the county lines. I would call attention to the fact that Saginaw County, on the south, has connected up its macadam roads with both the Bay County macadam roads extending to that county, making thereby two macadam connecting links between the county seats of the two counties. Wayne County, in addition to the one road extending to the county lines, as shown upon the map circulated by this organization, has eight lines of road extending to their county lines connecting up with every county touching Wayne County. This condition holds good in many of the counties throughout the State.

The map the National Highways Association has sent broadcast throughout the land shows only such roads in Michigan as have received the State reward. It is a fact, I believe, that at this time in Michigan there are several times as many miles of macadam and gravel roads actually constructed as have received this reward, inasmuch as the appropriations in the State have not been sufficient in the past to reward all these different communities as fast as the roads were built. And, too, many of the roads were constructed prior to the time the reward was given, and have not been able to qualify for this reward, as the roads were not constructed according to the specifications which have since been furnished by the State department of highways. These roads are rapidly being brought up to the required standard, and as fast as the appropriations will allow the reward is being extended.

It is the intention of the State highway department of Michigan to encourage the building of roads in the several counties so as to connect up the improved roads in the manner described between Bay and Saginaw Counties.

When the roads system of Michigan, as now proposed by the highway department of the State, shall have been completed, we will have a perfect network of good roads extending into every part of every county in the State, enabling the farmers in one county to market their crops as readily and economically as those in any other.

There has been much talk of insidious lobbying at the National Capitol in the past year, and certainly with justification. But I believe the form of literature sent out by the National Highways Association should be condemned as the worst form of lobbying. For instance, in a circular received recently, they

We want market roads. We want roads from farm to railroad. How are we to get them. We all wanted branch railroads first. Did we get them? No; we got the trunk lines first, and rightly. It will be the same with roads. If the farmer waits for the reversal of this law, he will "die in the mud." * * * They are now laboring under that infernally confusing, false, and misleading epithet, "Federal aid." Responsible for delay in congressional action. Responsible for the continuation of the activities of those more interested in their individual advancement than in the attainment of good roads. Responsible for the differences of opinion on the part of the body politic as to the wise plan to advocate. It sounds well. It can be made to mean anything which suits the selfish desires of the user. Indefinite, alluring, uncertain, vicious; it does not spell good roads. If the people of the United States have saddled upon them "Federal aid."—whatever it is made to mean—they will later awaken to the fatal error and their ignorance 'n permitting such extravagance, incompetence, and graft as the result thereof. And "by the eternal" we will provide so-called statesmen responsible therefor "with a long and much-needed vacation."

This is the type of argument this organization has sent to

This is the type of argument this organization has sent to every Member of this House. Believing, evidently, that their arguments for a system of national automobile boulevards not being sufficiently compelling, and that this House would have sufficient intelligence to undertake to provide roads that will really enable the farmer and every farmer to market his crops at a reasonable cost, they have resorted to the use of threats. They say, "We want market roads," "We want roads from farm to railroad" and in the same breath ask that this Government enter jointly into the expenditure of $25,000,000,000 for the purpose of building great concrete highways that will enable less than 1 per cent of the farmers of this country to utilize the same.

The system that I stand for is one which will enable every farmer in this country to share alike in whatever benefit is to be extended by this Government.

I extend a most cordial invitation to this organization to come into my district and state their case to my constituents. If they can convince the farmers in Arenac County that a concrete road running through Mecosta County is going to enable them to market their crops more readily or more economically, they will do something I believe can not be done. I would ask these gentlemen how the improvement of a road in Arenac County will enable the farmers of Osceola County to more readily send their children to school or to church or to allow the farmer of Osceola County to drive to town with his produce during the times when the roads are wet? Under the present condition of our roads it is practically impossible for a farmer to market his crops at such times, and any person will realize, if he will stop to think, that this is the time of all times when a farmer should be enabled to do this, inasmuch as the condition of the ground is such that he is not able to get into his fields to do the work that he can do at a time when the roads are good.

There were many conflicting opinions in the committee as to just what form the committee bill should take. Knowing that if any legislation whatever was to be enacted along these lines at this session of Congress it was necessary to come before this House with a solid front, the committee has attempted, in a spirit of compromise, to draw a bill that has, in a small measure at least, pleased all the members thereof. Under the committee bill as reported to the House it is possible for the States to receive aid in two different ways. The governor of each State will decide for the State under which section—3 or 4—it shall receive aid.

Section 3 provides that the Government and the State shall jointly enter into the construction of roads, and that these roads shall be maintained at the expense of the Federal Government and the State, which means that trunk lines will be built through the more populous sections of the State, and the more sparsely settled communities will be left to construct their roads entirely at their own expense.

Section 4 incorporates the fundamentals of my bill. It specifies that aid in maintenance and construction shall be extended generally to all the roads throughout the State. Each mile of ordinary dirt road properly graded, crowned, and drained will receive under this bill the sum of $15 annually for maintenance; each mile of gravel road properly graded, crowned, and drained will receive each year $30 for maintenance; each mile of macadam or other material of like cost will receive $60 per year for maintenance, provided the appropriation is great enough to enable the State to distribute this money in these amounts. If there is not enough money granted each State to extend the reward for maintenance in the amounts I have specified, it shall be divided pro rata, and there will be no aid extended in the construction of roads in that State. At the last meeting of the committee I submitted a resolution increasing the appropriation from $25,000,000 to $40,000,000, believing that we should start with at least this amount. My resolution was overwhelmingly voted down.

To my mind, section 3 of the bill submitted by the committee can not but work to the advantage of some communities at the disadvantage of many others, and I look to see all the States, with possibly a few exceptions, accept Federal aid under the provisions of section 4. I shall support the committee bill, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as if this is not done by the member-ship of this House no legislation upon this subject will be passed at this time.

I do not anticipate that $25,000,000 will be the extent of the appropriation in the years to come. I look to see this increased from year to year, as the people and the Members of Congress are brought to a realization of the immense economic advantages to be derived from the improvement of our rural highways. And that within the next 20 or 30 years our roads will be brought to a state of perfection that will enable the farmers to market their crops at a saving to themselves and the consuming public of more than $500,000,000 annually. [Applause.]

I will append herewith the following table:

Mr. Speaker, in connection with my speech on H. R. 11686 I wish to extend my remarks by inserting a copy of my bill, which is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10404) for the establishment of a bureau of postal high-ways and the extension of Federal aid in the construction and main-tenance of good roads in the several States and Territories and the civil subdivisions thereof.

tenance of good roads in the several States and Territories and the civil subdivisions thereof.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be established in the Post Office Department a bureau to be known as the bureau of postal highways.

Sec. 2. That it shall be the object and purpose of said bureau to coperate with the various States and Territories of the United States and the civil subdivisions thereof in the construction, improvement, and maintenance of permanent public roads now being utilized, or which may in the future be utilized, by the United States Government as rural mail or post roads.

Sec. 3. That said bureau shall be under the direction of a director of the bureau of postal highways, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive a salary of $7.500 per annum: Provided, however, That said director shall be a practical engineer of road construction.

Sec. 4. That said director of the bureau of postal highways is hereby empowered to appoint assistants in the various States and Terrtories, who shall be known as inspectors of postal highways: Provided, however, That there shall not be appointed more than 50 said inspectors of postal highways: Provided further, That said inspectors of postal highways: Provided further, That said inspectors of postal highways shall have passed with higher percentages than other competing applicants, and said inspectors of postal highways shall have passed with higher percentages than other competing applicants, and said inspectors of postal highways shall be to inspect the roads which may be constructed under the provisions of this act; that the said inspectors of postal highways shall be to inspect the roads which may be constructed under the provisions of this act; that the said inspectors of postal highways shall peopt to the said director of the bureau of postal highways their findings in each mile of road so inspected and their recommendation as to the class to which the said mile of road may properly which the said mile of road may properly belong, as specified hereinafter in this act.

Sec. 6. That the said inspectors of postal highways shall inspect under the direction of the director of the bureau of postal highways such roads as shall have been completed prior to the date that this act shall have become a law, and report his findings on each mile of road so inspected and his recommendation as to the class to which the said mile of road may properly belong as specified hereinafter in this act.

SEC. 7. That the Office of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture is hereby transferred to the Bureau of Postal Roads of the Post Office Department, together with all records and files, machinery, property, and equipment now used in connection with said Office of Public Roads.

(b) That the term 'road district," as used in this act, is defined to be any civil subdivision of any State or of any part of any such civil subdivision, or any two or more contiguous civil subdivisions or contiguous parts thereof, wherein a fund is provided either by taxation, the issuance of bonds, by popular subscription, or otherwise, to be used exclusively for the building and improving of the public highways thereof and in which proper officials shall have been duly selected to receive and expend such fund, and who shall be responsible to the public by the giving of bond, or otherwise, for the proper expenditure of such fund and of any reward payable to said district under the provisions of this act.

(c) That the term "rural post road" as used in this act is defined to be any public highway outside of all incorporated cities and villages over which the United States regularly transports rural mall, whether by rural free delivery or star route: Provided, however, That such terms shall in no instance be construed to include any private or toll road.

Sec. 9. That the public roads of the several States and Territories by rural free delivery or star route: Provided, however, That such terms shall in no instance be construed to include any private or tell road.

SEC. 9. That the public roads of the several States and Territories and the civil subdivisions thereof are, for the purposes of this act, divided into the following classes:

Class A. Every mile of rural post road outside of incorporated cities and villages, upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary, with ample side ditches, and which is kept well crowned, graded, and compacted by dragging, or other adequate means, so that it shall have a smooth surface and be passable for vehicles at all times.

Class B. Every mile of well-graded road, outside of incorporated cities and villages, upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary, the width of which shall not be less than 20 feet between and exclusive of side ditches, and which shall be properly drained and have a wagon way or travel track properly crowned not less than 9 feet wide and made of a mixture of sand and clay 8 inches deep, the consistency of which shall be specified by the director of the bureau of postal highways.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield eight minutes to my colleague from Missouri [Mr. Russell]. [Applause.]

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to authorize the expenditure by the Government of $25,000,000 to aid in improving the post roads of the country. If it becomes a law, $1,018,750 will go to the State that I have the honor, in part,

I can not now discuss at length the merits of this important bill, nor is it necessary for me to do so. The opinion of the House is already formed, and the Representatives here, I believe, are ready to express by their votes their approval of its provisions.

It is no longer seriously contended that the Government has not the power to aid in establishing or maintaining post roads, as provided and as contemplated by the Constitution. It is now, as I understand and believe, simply a question of right, necessity, and expediency.

The annual appropriations of Congress for years have been more than $1,000,000,000, and will probably be no less in this session. Of these appropriations, millions of dollars are expended in the Diplomatic and Consular Service beyond the seas; $14,000,000 are expended in maintaining and beautifying this Capital City, with its beautiful parks and splendid roads that are enjoyed by a comparatively few of the American people: $40,000,000 are expended in improving our rivers and harbors to promote the commerce of the country, which I have no doubt is wise; over $400,000,000 are expended to sustain the military arm of the Government, to pay the expenses of wars that have been, and to prepare for possible future wars that we hope and believe will never come.

It is not my purpose to-day to criticize any of these liberal expenditures; they, or the most of them, are probably reasonable and necessary in this advanced age, with the increasing necessities incident to our modern civilization and the great growth and progress of our country. But I do desire to say, and to emphasize the statement with all the earnestness I feel, that there is no appropriation that will be made by this Congress, there is none that can be made, that will be a direct benefit to so many people as the expenditure provided for in this bill. [Applause.]

A few of the daring may glide through the hazy heights above in flying machines, some of the wealthy tourists may cross the mighty deep in the great ocean-going vessels, and part of the people may traverse our continent in the modern trains on our steam railways; but all the people of this Republic—nearly every man, woman, and child—travel almost daily upon the public roads. They are traveled by millions of children of both rich and poor on their way to the country schools; they are traveled by the youth of our land on trips of recreation and pleasure; they are traveled by the Christian families of rural homes in going to and from church on the Sabbath day. They are the highways upon which the foodstuffs produced on the farms that feed the Nation must be transported to the markets.

Our city friends say that this is only a benefit to the rural communities and of no value to the inhabitants of the great I dislike to think that there is a single Representative upon this floor so forgetful of his duty to the whole people or who is so blinded by his environments that he can not look beyoud the corporate limits of the city he represents and see the necessities of the farmers of the country, or who is not interested enough in the success of agriculture to favor the facilities that will promote that most important industry.

In conclusion permit me to say that good roads puts the producer nearer to the market and nearer to the consumer. will make cheaper to him the products of the farm without lessening the price to the farmer, and hence is a benefit to both.

No bill more important to more people can come before this House, and none should receive a more hearty support than this bill for Government aid in the construction and improving of public roads. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE].

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the good-roads bill under discussion at this time bears the earmarks in many respects of a bill I introduced in Congress nearly nine years ago. do not claim any great originality in the substance of that bill, but I do congratulate both branches of Congress in the important step we are about to take, for I believe this is one of the most important questions before the American people.

The greatest problem we have to solve is to bring the producer and consumer into the cheapest, the easiest, and quickest communication with each other. To this end billions of dollars have been expended on railroads and steamships; to this end the National Government has been liberal in its expenditures in deepening the channels of our rivers; to this end Congress did not hesitate to spend $400,000,000 in digging the Panama Canal. I voted for this expenditure, for I realized its importance to the American shipper. I am proud to have been a Representative from the State of Georgia voting to expend this vast sum for the construction of the canal. Yet onehalf of this sum expended on our country roads would have brought more comfort, happiness, and prosperity to the American people. We appropriated last year more than a billion dol-lars for the support of the various branches of the Government. This year the appropriations will likely exceed the billion-dollar mark. The Army will get one hundred millions, the Navy will get one hundred and forty millions, the Post Office Department gets three hundred and five millions, the agricultural bill will carry less than twenty-six millions, and we are asking for only twenty-five millions for good roads in the entire United States. This is the one item in which the farmer is directly benefited.

The total farm products of the year 1913 amounted to $9,751,119,000. The farmers added more to the aggregate wealth of the country than all other sources combined. It may be of interest to note the value of the principal farm products for the year 1913:

Miscellaneous animal products Buckwheat Hops Flaxseed Rice Rye Wool Sugar beets, sugar cane, sorghum, maple, etc Barley Tobacco Sweet and Irish potatoes Oats Poultry and eggs Wheat Hay Dairy products Miscellaneous crops Cotton Corn Animals sold and slaughtered	439, 596, 000 578, 488, 000 610, 123, 000 797, 077, 000 814, 202, 000 956, 177, 000 944, 675, 000 1, 692, 092, 000
Total	9, 751, 119, 000

To illustrate the enormous relative value of one of these crops, let us take cotton. For the year 1913 the value of cotton lint was $797,841,000; cotton seed, $146,834,000; total value of cotton crop, $944,675,000.

I find on investigation that the cotton crop for the past 10 years was worth $7,539,000,000. The total value of all the gold and silver mined in the world from 1904 to 1913 amounts to $5,433,465,492. That is, the cotton crop was worth $2,105,534,508 more than all the gold and silver mined in the world for a period embracing the past 10 years.

I call your attention to these facts to show the importance of but one crop grown on our farms. Every pound of this enormous tonnage must find a market over country roads which are during the rainy months almost impassable.

Those who have given the question of good roads the closest study say that the cost of getting production from the farm to the nearest railroad station is greater than the sum the railroads charge for hauling them to the places where they are consumed. I do not see how it is possible to arrive at a definite conclusion as to this, but a pretty close estimate can be made. It depends on the nature of the roads. Some are level and some hilly, some hard and others soft and miry, and the size of a load that can be hauled over a road is regulated by the worst part of it. The farmer hauling a load to market or to his home from town can haul only as much as his team can pull over the worst part of the road.

Roughly speaking, there are over a quarter of a million miles of railroads in the United States, equal in length to 42 lines, each 3,000 miles long, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and 125 lines, 1,000 miles long each, from the Gulf or the Mexican border to the Lakes or Canadian border. If the railroad systems were run in parallel lines north and south and east and west, they would divide the country into blocks 24 miles square. Eight miles we may assume as the nearest distance the average farmer would have to haul his crop.

In going to and from the nearest railroad station the average farmer would drive 16 miles. A good two-horse team could pull three bales of cotton over the average country roads. The use of the team and driver would be worth $3 per day, and at that rate it would cost $1 per bale to take the crop to the nearest station, which is fully as much as it would cost to haul it from that station to New York, or more than it would cost to haul it from the nearest seaport to Liverpool. Of course, the farmer might occasionally take a return load from town, thus leaving his crop to bear a less cost for the trip. Even then the cost of getting to the nearest station would almost equal the charge for carrying his crop from one side of the ocean to the other. If the roads were good he could haul twice as much. If this country were covered with good roads it would save to the farmer or the consumer a sum nearly if not quite equal to the freight earnings of all the railroads in the United States.

I mention this not for the information of Members of this House, for others are as familiar with it as I am. I take it for granted that every Member of this House is as strongly impressed with the benefit of good roads as I am. I give this as an estimate of the sum that goes out of the pockets of Americans—a complete waste under present conditions, that would remain in their pockets if this country were covered with a network of good roads. The importance of good roads will be universally conceded.

The next question is, Who will build them? I concede that 50 per cent of the burden of the work should be borne by the States or the communities that would be benefited by it.

I think the Federal Government should lend its encouragement and its aid to this work under regulations that would give to each State its definite share after it had complied with conditions insuring Federal aid. The work will be more scientifically, more economically, more effectively done under a system in which the Federal Government will participate than when it is done by the State, or possibly by the counties, and then we need not try to blink out the fact that the people in some communities feel, and often with good reason, that purely local work generally means unpreparedness, while work in which the Federal Government participates is usually well done.

In urging Federal participation in road building I am not proposing that the Government assume any new powers or duties. Before my father was born the Government was building roads. In the earlier days of the Republic road building was as unquestionably regarded a power and a duty of the Federal Government as river and harbor improvements are now. I think our best lawyers of to-day will admit that the early patriots of our country were right in the interpretation of their duties. The records of the earlier Congresses are full of road bills. In fact, my recollection is that through the administrations of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and John Quincy Adams, and into the administration of Andrew Jackson—good old Democratic days—the Government did more road building than any other work under the "general-welfare" clause of the Constitution.

While the Federal Government has assumed other powers that were not at first supposed to belong to it, this power or duty fell into disuse, and perhaps properly so under conditions then existing. The Government did not encourage the building of roads or assist in their building. It built them and there was no regulation governing the apportionment of its work. It built roads, each by special act of Congress and wherever Congress voted to build them. The result was the appearance of the pork barrel. Members would no doubt swap influence, and roads were built wherever there was a combination strong enough to secure them.

The circumstances to-day are different. The bill which we offer would leave no room for a scramble. It would apportion Government aid in a fixed manner with fixed conditions precedent to securing it.

I think the building of railroads had something to do with the withdrawal of the Government from road building. The railroads became the military and the post roads. But since the Government has undertaken the rural delivery of mails, it is necessary for some one to build good roads to facilitate their delivery. Rural-delivery routes are being gradually extended, and it is not an idle dream to say that the time will come when the postman will go to every man's door. The parcel post, another great factor in our development, also tends to the interchange of commodities between country and city, and as its use becomes more prevalent it will be more and more necessary to have roads over which loads can be handled economically.

So good roads through the States are needed for the Government's business, and it follows from this that the Federal Government should lend its encouragement to the work of building them. The Post Office Department undertakes to serve all the people. Where railroads extend they carry the mails, but the rural carriers go where there are no railroads. If a community away from the railroads needs a post office, one is established. The Federal Government does not tell the people of such community to build a railroad or do without mail facilities, and it should not tell a section that needs rural-delivery route with access to the parcel post that goes with it to build a hard road or do without the conveniences of rural delivery.

The people of the rural districts have exceptional claims on the Government. I do not base this statement on the fact that they feed the population and lay the foundation of the prosperity of the cities, but I base it on the idea that through many decades of legislation the Government has discriminated against the farmer. It has arranged for others to reap where he has sown. To the extent that it has sought to build up prosperity of a class, it has done so at the farmers' expense. the effort has been made to swell the profits of capital invested in manufacturing, and the advocates of protection have professed a purpose of holding up the wages of labor engaged in manufacturing. But to raise this fund to enrich this class the farmer has been taxed. He has borne his share of the burdens without a share of the profits. Gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber have voted duties on agricultural products, but in few instances has it been possible for such duties to benefit the agricultural classes who produce a surplus for export and, not being combined to fix prices, they have had to sell the bulk of their products at home at a price below that which was paid for hir surplus abroad.

The latest Republican President, and I believe the last, admitted that the tariff on agricultural products was a sham. He favored its repeal, and in doing so said it conferred no benefits on agricultural classes. Our banking laws have also discriminated against the farmer. The Government, which has neglected them, I may say oppressed them, so long is under obligation to assist in securing their welfare and happiness the stronger because of its long discrimination against them.

Nature works slowly, but it works to rectify wrongs, and the time has arrived when, out of this long oppression, has come a compensation. Life was made so hard and unremunerative on the farm that the young men as they grew up turned toward the city where work secured them something more than mere existence. For 30 years, while the cities have grown rapidly, the country has remained almost at a standstill, and it has come to pass that the farms of the land are scarcely able to feed the millions of city population. The value of the farm products has risen vastly more, and we hear all over the land complaints of the high cost of living. The whole country is suffering from high prices for food products, and there is but one remedyproduce more food; to do this, more producers of needed. Back to the farm is now the cry from the cities that heretofore have been drawing from the farm the most energetic young men. Back to the farm! The welfare of the whole country demands it.

The farm conditions n.ust be made as agreeable as possible, and the first requirement is good roads. The increase in rural population is a national need, and the Nation should help to bring it about. The uplifters have been studying conditions of rural life, with a view to their betterment. The Government has a commission at work along this line. Nothing will so much improve conditions on the farm as a provision that will draw the people together socially. Road building tends to remove the oppressive solitude that has so long operated to depopulate the country and to substitute for it a large measure of the pleasures of city life. We have a quarter of a million miles of railroad track, which, I said, if run in parallel lines from north to south and from east to west, would block off the country into squares 24 miles each way, and I estimated that the average farmer was 8 miles from a railroad station. But we have about 30,000 miles of inland navigable waters which we are beginning to realize can be made much more useful to us than an equal extent of railroads. These, if run in parallel lines from north to south and from east to west, would block off the country anto squares 200 miles each way, and the average farmer would live 70 miles from them. To the territory they can serve these streams would furnish transportation for our products at onethird the cost of transporting them by rail. The producer and consumer would share the savings effected by this economy. Good roads would double the zone of country in reach of waterways, and in the interest of people in country and city I think that road development should be considered supplementary to waterway improvement.

The bill under discussion provides for the appropriation of $25,000,000 for the current year for cooperative work between the Federal Government and the States for the construction of roads. Under this bill there could be no scramble for appropriations, for the bill apportions the fund between the States by inflexible rules—one-half in proportion to the mileage of rural delivery and one-half in proportion to population. Each State to avail itself of its share must raise a like sum for the work; and in case a State finally fails to qualify for Federal aid, its share will be converted back into the Treasury.

The apportionment in proportion to rural delivery is an apportionment in proportion to need both of State and Federal Government for the area involved. The apportionment in proportion to population corresponds closely with what the State contributes to the support of the Federal Government. The Federal Government gets little of its revenues from tax on wealth. Certainly very little until the passage of the incometax law. It derives a large part from a tax on consumption, and so the contribution approximates much more closely to a per capita than to a wealth basis.

I have discussed the question mainly from a standpoint of the farmer—a class fed on protestation of love while being taxed to supply substantial benefits to others. But it is not the farmer alone who would be benefited. If the farmer can get his crop to market at less cost than he now pays, the city man will be able to buy them for less than he now gives for them. What is proposed in this bill will bring greater prosperity to the farm and will reduce the high cost of living in the city. If the superior comforts and pleasures of rural life attract more men to the farm, production will increase and prices will decline and the city man's dollar will buy more than it buys now.

I have a confident faith that this Congress will pass this measure, of such great importance to the welfare of the Nation and to the happiness of its rural population. I am proud that I have been one of the pioneers in urging this legislation. And when the day comes that this bill, or one similar to it, is written upon our statute books I believe that the Nation will then enter upon a good-roads era which can be clearly distinguished by the future historian, and for the countless benefits that will flow from this great work the 100,000,000 people whom we represent will commend us for having served them so truly and so well.

Our country is endowed with every element of true greatness. I do not refer to the overwhelming power that can crush an enemy; we have demonstrated this on many battlefields. It has that, but there is something better. I refer to the fertile fields, so ready to yield the abundant harvest; to the mountain and hill, treasure vaults of coal, iron, silver, and gold; to the streams that, rushing downward to the plains, invite man to come and harness them to do his work, and then, in their more placid stretches, offer to bear for him, at lowest cost, commodities from the producer to the consumer. Providence gives nothing in finished shape. It only cooperates with man in doing his work. The Federal Government, work-ing for the general welfare, is helping the people of all sections to derive the greatest degree of benefit from the natural advantages that surround them. The work broadens with the years, the work of removing obstacles to success. And I look forward to the coming of the day, whether I live to see it or not, when all parts of this country and all classes of this land will enjoy the conveniences that are now largely confined to the great centers of population, and life will offer its pleasures to all who live beneath the shelter of our national flag. [Applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY] consume some of his time?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. Browne].

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, one of the most important and pressing economic and social questions before the people to-day is that of improving the Nation's highways. Every morning an army of 43,000 rural letter carriers start on their journeys, and when they return at nightfall they have traversed over 1,000,000 miles of wagon roads. Over these roads the whole food supply of the Nation is hauled annually in wagons, and in addition the vast tonnage of foodstuffs that we export to foreign countries. Over these roads men, women, and children are obliged to travel in all kinds of weather, on foot, in wagons, and on horseback, 365 days in the year.

Every man's house faces on a road that connects with every other road and leads to every other man's house and to every market place throughout the land.

The capital to-day invested in agriculture, including the personal property, amounts to the stupendous sum of $40,000,000,000. About 50,000,000 of our 92,000,000 people reside in the country; that is, outside of cities of 2,500 inhabitants or over. Yet, out of the annual appropriations made by this Government, less than 10 per cent of the money goes to the country in any way, and practically 90 per cent of it goes to the cities.

GOOD ROADS WOULD CHEAPEN TRANSPORTATION.

Now, we claim, Mr. Chairman, that good roads will lessen the cost of transportation. It costs more to haul a ton of freight or a ton of produce by wagon in the United States than in any other country in the world. It has been conservatively estimated that one-third of the cost of every product is the cost of transporting that product from where it is produced to where it is consumed. If there is a great needless loss in the cost of The worktransportation, every consumer shares in that loss. ingman at his breakfast table in the city who may be the ulti-mate consumer stands his share of it. The highest tax the people are paying to-day is the mud and bad road tax. plause.] Anything we can do to cheapen transportation is a benefit to everybody. Congress annually appropriates large sums of money to facilitate and cheapen transportation. The river and harbor appropriation, the Panama Canal, the land grants to railroads have all been justified because they have tended to cheapen transportation. We have cheapened transportation so much that to-day on the Great Lakes, the great waterways of the country, we can carry a ton of freight from 1,500 to 2,000 miles for $1.25. The leading railroad systems can carry freight 150 to 200 miles for $1.25, while over the wagon roads we can carry a ton of freight less than 5 miles for $1.25.

In fact, it costs more on an average to haul a bushel of potatoes from the farm where they are produced to the nearest market place than it does to haul them from Dublin, Ireland, to New York City. If by good roads we can lessen the cost of transportation by wagon 50 or 75 per cent, it is going to reduce the cost of production and ultimately reduce the high cost of living.

It has been said by a Secretary of Agriculture that it costs the farmers every year to move the great crops they raise something like $1,600,000,000, and that from four to five hundred million dollars of this amount could be saved by good roads. Heretofore we have looked upon the wagon roads as something that concerns simply the farmer, the man who lives upon the road, and we have not considered that it was the problem of anybody else. We have shouldered the responsibility of building and keeping in repair 2,000,000 miles of road upon the farmer alone, and then we criticize him for not making better roads and keeping them in better repair.

GOOD ROADS WOULD BENEFIT EVERYBODY.

The question of good roads is a problem that concerns everybody. At one end of every road is the farmer with his crops for sale, aggregating last year nearly $10,000,000,000.

At the other end of the road is the city with its people waiting to be fed, with its merchants waiting for trade, and with the railroads waiting for goods to transport. To whose advantage is it to have a road for the farmer to come to town? It is clearly to the advantage of the merchant and the city and the railroad more than it is for the farmer. The farms and the farmer are the great and abiding support of the city.

OUR ROAD SYSTEM ANTIQUATED.

We in America inherited our system of roads from England, a system England abandoned centuries ago. Macaulay in his history of England, in speaking about the road system of England before Government aid, writes:

The highways appear to have been far worse than might have been expected from the degree of wealth and civilization which the nation had even then attained. Every parish was bound to repair the highway which passed through it. That a route connecting two great towns which have a large and thriving trade should be maintained at the cost of the rural population scattered between them is obviously unjust. The injustice attracted the attention of Parliament, and the act, the first of many turnpike acts, was passed. This innovation, however, excited many murmurs; a change was at length effected, but not without much difficulty, for injustice and absurd taxation to which me are accustomed is often borne more willingly than the more reasonable impost which is new.

At that time in the seventeenth century England changed her system and the Government took a hand in road building, and the magnificent system of roads in England show the wisdom of her course. It will not be contended, Mr. Chairman, but that the roads of this country are wholly inadequate. The question is how to build and maintain these roads so as to meet the demands and requirements of the twentieth century civilization, and whether the farmer alone shall pay for the cost of the road to town or whether he shall be aided by the city, State, and GOVERNMENT EARLY ESTABLISHED PRECEDENT FOR FEDERAL AID.

The Government at an early day embarked in road building. Way back in 1806, under Thomas Jefferson-in fact, before that time George Washington in one of his messages to Congress advocated and recommended national roads. But in 1806 Thomas Jefferson advocated national aid for roads. Afterwards, through the efforts of Henry Clay, the great Cumberland road was started, and between six and seven million dollars were appropriated by the Government for this road. Then began a great era of railroad building and land grants to railroads were made and the railroads were given millions of acres of land—as much public land, in fact, as is contained in several of our largest States of the Union-to aid in railroad construction. The matter of road building was practically forgotten until the present time. The only national roads the Government has built since that time have been in the Philippines, Porto Rico, and the national parks.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I will.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman does not mean to say that the Government has built roads in the Philippine

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I understand Congress appropriated within a session or two something like $6,000,000 for roads in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Congress authorized the Philippine Government to appropriate out of the Philippine revenue money for roads.

Mr. SAUNDERS. We have built in Panama the same sort of Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. I supposed that it was the Government that built them in the Philippines, but we have built them in Panama and in the national parks.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes.
Mr. LOBECK. We have built roads to the forts in the West, and the Government had to build them as military roads.

Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes; we have built some military roads.

Mr. LOBECK.

Mr. LOBECK. A good many of them. Mr. BROWNE of Wisconsin. Yes; and I think those are all precedents for the Federal Government to build roads, and the character of the few roads built by the Government demonstrates that the Government builds good roads when it under-takes it. The question of Federal aid for roads was debated in the early days of the Republic, and the question of the constitutionality was debated, and it was settled then and there that it was not only constitutional for the Government to build national roads but that it was a very wise and proper policy to

I believe at the present time we are prepared to start in and help build the road to town. One thing that has probably attracted the attention of the Government to the necessity of aiding in the building of these roads has been the establishment of the rural free delivery and the parcels post.

RURAL DELIVERY AND PARCELS POST GREAT BENEFIT TO FARMER,

In the establishment of rural free delivery and parcels post this Government, in my judgment, conferred the greatest benefit it ever conferred on its rural population. The parcel post has been administered so successfully during its first trial year that the size of the articles carried has increased from 12 to 50 pounds, and will undoubtedly within the next few years be again increased to meet the demands of a rural population of 50,000,000 people, and freight will eventually be carried by the Government. To do this it is going to require better roads, a better system of road building, and governmental aid.

I believe also in the extension of our rural routes so that in the end every man, no matter where his farm is located, if it is located on a road, can have his mail, and that now includes packages of 50 pounds, delivered at his front gate.

The road sentiment has grown wonderfully in the last 10 The National Grange, the Society of Equity, and various other large agricultural societies who speak with authority for the farming population are calling loudly for State and National

Forty States, most of them in the last 10 years, have established highway departments, and many of these are aiding in road building.

The farmer argues that if the Government is spending hundreds of millions of dollars on its rivers and harbors to facilitate transportation, why should it not expend a few millions of dollars annually on its wagon roads, over which a hundred times as much traffic passes? I know rivers in my own State, where hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent by the Government, over which there is not as much traffic passes in a year as over some of the country roads in my State in a week.

DIFFICULTIES IN DRAFTING A NATIONAL-AID LAW.

To draft a law which will be workable in 48 States under conditions entirely different, a law that States whose constitutions do not permit of State aid for road building can receive aid, is not an easy task.

The Road Committee has been aided by the work of the Special Committee on Roads of both Houses appointed in the last Congress. It has had before it at least 20 different road bills, it has listened to the discussion of men, many of them experts and all road enthusiasts, from all parts of the country, and in presenting this bill it believes it has presented a bill that will be workable in all the States.

IMPORTANT FEATURES OF THE PROPOSED LAW.

One of the important considerations in a road bill is the distribution of money. This bill proposes to apportion the $25,000,000 as follows: One-half on the basis of population in the proportion which the total population of the State bears to the total population of the United States; one-half on the basis the number of miles of rural post roads in use in such State bears to the total miles of rural post roads in use in all the

This apportionment is fair both to the large State with a small population and the small State with a large population.

The United States shall pay not to exceed one-half of the cost of the construction and maintenance of any road, and the State, or subdivision thereof, shall provide one-half of the cost.

OPTION OF STATES UNDER PROPOSED LAW.

The State has the option of expending the money received from the National Government on a system of roads as provided in section 3 of the bill, or section 4, or partly under both.

If it accepts the option given it under section 3 of the bill, the State through proper authority will cooperate with the Secretary of Agriculture in determining the roads to be improved and the manner of constructing and improving them, and the State shall afford such inspection and maintenance as the Secretary of Agriculture shall require.

The second option is a reward plan and provides for the classification of roads A, B, and C.

resources.

Class A is a macadam road, or its equivalent, properly constructed, graded, and so forth. As aid for this kind of a road the Government will contribute out of the State's apportionment $60 per mile.

Class B is a gravel, shell, or combination of sand and clay road, or its equivalent, properly graded and constructed, toward which the Government will contribute out of the State's apportionment $30 per mile.

Class C is a graded road, well drained, constructed so as to shed water, and kept crowned and compacted by dragging, toward which the Government will contribute $15 per mile.

The State or civil subdivision thereof shall expend in the construction, maintenance, or extension of any such roads an amount equal to the amount paid by the United States.

I will submit at the close of my remarks two tables showing the number of miles of rural and star routes of each State, and also the amount each State is entitled to under this apportionment in this bill and on the basis of a $25,000,000 appropriation. WHAT WISCONSIN WILL RECEIVE.

The State of Wisconsin under the appropriation will receive $752,500 annually for roads. Wisconsin last year produced $80,000,000 worth of dairy products, and thus passed the great State of New York in the value of its dairy products, leading all the States in the Union. have hundreds of thousands of acres of cut-over lands in Wisconsin, an even rainfall and a heavy soil makes these lands the best lands for dairying and stock raising in the world. All we need is good roads to unlock the door to our great ratural GOVERNMENT AID WILL STIMULATE ROAD BUILDING.

If Congress passes this bill, it is going to stimulate road building throughout the United States.

GOOD ROADS WILL MAKE RURAL LIFE MORE ATTRACTIVE.

It will check the drift of population from the farms to the cities. In the last 10 years, from 1900 to 1910, the urban population increased 50 per cent, while the rural population increased only 11.2 per cent, and in some of the great agricultural States the rural population decreased. This is a situation and tendency which is viewed by many with alarm, and the National Government and many States are in various ways trying to turn back the tide toward the cities with the movement "back to the farm."

Good roads will tend to help the movement more than anything this Government can do.

Many of the good-road enthusiasts have urged the Roads Committee to report a bill appropriating a large sum of money to build a great transcontinental, ocean-to-ocean highway. Such a road would undoubtedly be eujoyed by the tourists and travelers and be of some practical benefit to those living on or tributary to it, but it would not serve 95 per cent of our population.

tary to it, but it would not serve 95 per cent of our population.

The committee has endeavored to frame a law which will help the farmer in moving his crops to market, and which will eventually make a system of roads connecting all parts of our

I believe that a system of roads such as Government aid will insure will improve the condition of rural life and make it more attractive, and have a direct bearing upon the social, intellectual, and economic welfare of the whole people; that it will be followed by a greater activity and cooperation on the part of the rural population of this country that will mean an era of the greatest prosperity this country has ever known.

of the greatest prosperity this country has ever known.

Charles Sumner, more than 50 years ago, truly said that "the two greatest forces for the advancement of civilization are the schoolmaster and good roads."

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT].

[Mr. DAVENPORT addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Hamlin].

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of good-roads legislation at this session of Congress, and I am therefore glad that the Rules Committee have made it possible for this bill to be taken up in the House this early in the session. So anxious am I to get this bill through, so it can go early over to the Senate, that I would not take any time to discuss the bill here were it not for the fact that I am a member of the committee which has been designated by the House to go to Michigan to investigate the great copper strike now on in that State, and it may be necessary for me to leave for that place before this bill is finished and voted upon, and I am therefore anxious to record myself now in favor of Government aid of some kind in the building of good roads.

This is not a perfect bill. I do not believe that one can be drawn until we have tried out the experiment; but I believe that it is the best bill available and is undoubtedly a step in the right direction. If this bill becomes a law, then after it is in operation its defects and shortcomings, if any, will be detected by actual experience, and it will then be an easy matter to amend and in that way finally work out a practically perfect measure.

This bill contains two propositions. Section 3 provides for the Government aiding the different States or subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of good roads, the Federal Government to pay one-half of the cost, which money is to be available as soon as the other half is raised by the States or local communities, in such manner as that State or local community may determine. And this money is to be expended under the supervision of the State authorities and the Secretary of Agriculture. It appears to me that this is a very liberal proposition on the part of the Federal Government. If these roads are to be built by Government aid, it must be on the theory that they are post roads. I mean by that, roads over which the Government is engaged in carrying the mails. This is required so as to conform to the Constitution of the United States. Congress has no authority to appropriate money for the building of roads except these roads are to be used as post roads, military roads, or, perhaps, for the transportation of interstate traffic.

Section 4 provides for the payment of rentals by the Federal Government on roads already built by the States or some subdivision thereof, or for roads hereafter to be built wholly at the expense of the State or subdivision thereof; and for the purpose of fixing the amount to be paid by the Federal Government on any particular road the bill divides the different kinds of roads into three classes, known as class A, class B, and class C. A is to be a macadam road, and class B to be a well-built road with a road track composed of shells, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay, or other material of equal utility but less expensive than macadam, constructed in such manner that it shall have a smooth, firm surface." Class C embraces roads built out of dirt or such material as is in the roadway, built in such way as to adequately drain, with ample side ditches to shed the water, and to keep the crown compact by dragging or other adequate means, so that it can be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles.

For class A the Government agrees to pay an annual rental of $60 per mile; for class B, $30 per mile; and class C, $15 per mile. I am inclined to think that these amounts are perhaps not equitably rated. While I recognize that the Government ought to pay more rental on high-class reads-if for no other reason than to encourage the building of better roadsam inclined to think that the difference specified in the bill is a little too great. But I understand that these rates have been fixed by the committee, like nearly every other proposition must be done in legislation, largely as a compromise between conflicting views.

It may be well to state here in further explanation of the bill, as I understand it, that $25,000,000 is authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of this bill during the next fiscal year and this money is to be prorated to the different States upon the following basis. No State will receive less than $65,000. Then one-half of the amount will be based on the basis that the total population of a particular State bears to the total population of all the States. The other half of the allotment will be based upon the basis which the total mileage of rural routes in any particular State bears to the total mileage of the rural routes in all the States of the Union. This I regard as a splendid provision in this bill, for it prevents some of the larger States from getting all of this money. In other words, it treats all of the States fairly.

This seems quite a large appropriation for the first year and some of the opponents to this bill argue that it will not be long, if this scheme is carried out, until we will be appropriating a hundred million dollars a year for good roads. It appears to me that a sufficient answer to that criticism is that not one cent of this money can be spent unless we have good roads to spend it on, and if the time should come when we shall be expending a hundred million dollars a year on good roads it is a cinch we will have the good roads. And if we have good roads it will increase the value of the farms and town property, to say nothing of the other benefits to all the people, not only a hundred million dollars but billions of dollars.

We have been spending millions of dollars each year to build great engines of warfare with which to destroy our fellow men. I would rather-infinitely rather-put the money in building good roads in our country, thereby conserving the lives and happiness of our boys and girls and making rural life more comfortable and pleasant.

There is another proposition advocated by some. That is to have the Government build or aid in building what my friend Judge Shackleford designates as peacock boulevards across the country from ocean to ocean. Now, I have no objection to these cross-country roads, and I would be glad if we had any number of them, not only one east and west but one north and south, if we can also have these post roads. But I confess that these boulevards would be of but little value to the millions of farmers throughout the length and breath of this country, who would have to bear largely the expense of these boulevards and suffer most from the lack of good roads. I prefer, therefore, to support a proposition that tends to build good roads, not boulevards, throughout the country, so that the farmers can haul their produce to town, send their children to school, and take their families to church on Sunday in some degree of comfort. Adopt the rural free-delivery routes, as this bill does, and you can secure a network of good roads throughout every section of the country, provided the purpose of from the farms to the large cities. The temptations which sur-this bill is fully carried out. There is scarcely a town of any size in the whole country from which there does not radiate from 4 to 10 rural routes, running out like spokes of a wheel. These carriers go out on one road on an average of about 10 miles and come back on another.

Take a town with four routes running out. That means that they use about eight different roads out from this town an average of 10 miles. Suppose these roads were built up to even class C, and a blind man can see at a glance the great benefit it would be to all the farmers living around that town, as well as the benefit to the merchants and other people living in the And then, again, the routes out of one town practically, and frequently do, meet the routes out of another town, and if we could get all of these roads improved we would have a complete network of good roads throughout the entire traveled section of our country; and I can conceive of nothing that would be of as much material benefit to all the people.

It has been urged by some that the people of the large cities will have to pay a large per cent of this cost. That is true, but they will undoubtedly get a large per cent of the benefits. This system benefits the whole country and makes it prosperous, and therefore benefits the large cities and makes them prosperous. The large cities do not make the country, but the country does make the large cities. The farmers produce the stuff which feeds the world, and we are confronted to-day by a loud, persistent, and, I think, a just cry, coming up from the consumer in the cities against the high cost of living

This road scheme about which I have been talking will, I believe, if carried out, go a long way toward solving this prob-The farmers have prospered for the last several years and will, I believe, continue to prosper; but I want to make this statement—while it may seem somewhat startling, nevertheless it is true—the farmers do not get for their products over 50 per cent of what their products cost the consumer. Naturally you ask, Who gets the other 50 per cent? I answer, it is eaten up on express charges and commission to the middlemen.

Mr. Chairman, let me give you a concrete illustration: The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Læwis], who has given this transportation question more study than any other man in this House, informed me that he took the trouble to trace $5 worth of produce, such as butter, chickens, eggs, and so forth, from a farmer out 25 miles from this city into Washington and into the homes of the people who consumed the same. This particular shipment for which the farmer received $5 cost the people who consumed it here in Washington $11.20, or more than double what the farmer got for it; and what is true in this particular case is true all over the country. The farmers are therefore unjustly blamed for the high cost of living.

There was great opposition to the passage of the parcel-post I think already that it has been proven, even in the short time it has been in operation, to be a splendid law. I thought so at the time, and was heartily in favor of its enactment. Now, with parcel post operating over good roads, such as this bill provides, forming a network throughout the country so that the rural carriers can transport large packages, much of the things the farmer raises can go by parcel post direct to the consumers in the cities, saving the heavy express charges and cutting out the commission of the middlemen, and thereby lowering the high cost of living and at the same time enabling the farmer to get as good or a better price for his produce than he does now. So from almost any standpoint it seems to me that this bill is a most excellent step in the right direction.

I referred a few moments ago to the building of battleships. It may not be uninteresting to know that last year the total net appropriations for all purposes of the Federal Government was $788,864,598.73, and of this fabulous sum $335,440,612.85 went to the Army and Navy. Practically one-half of this appropria-tion last year went to support the military arm of this Government, and yet we boast that we are at peace with the whole world and that we are the leading Christian Nation of the earth. If the present program is carried out, it will be even worse this year, for it is now proposed to build two battleships instead of one, and we have reached a point where we can not build battle-ships for less than $17,000,000 each.

When I first came to Congress a few years ago, we thought it was terrible to build a battleship at a cost of $5,000,000, but now we do not think of building one which costs less than $17,000,000. And, to my mind, this program is out of harmony with the fundamental ideas of our people. Let us cut out these battleships and use this money in helping to improve our country, and consequently the conditions of our people.

Those of us who contemplate seriously the great moral as well as economic problems which are confronting us, realize the round them in the cities are innumerable. We must realize that the real safety of our Government depends upon the moral standing of our people. No place has yet been found so good as the rural districts in which to develop not only the muscle but the brain and moral characters of the boys and girls. have never ceased to be thankful that it was my good fortune to be born and reared on the farm. So, of course, any proposition intended to improve and make comfortable and attractive farm life receives my most hearty support. I hope that this bill will pass and let us try it out, and then if defects and imperfections are found in this measure we can in the future

I feel that there can not be too much praise given to Judge SHACKLEFORD for his extraordinary industry and courage in standing by the people who live in the rural districts, and as chairman of the great Committee on Good Roads in the House he has worked out a plan which we believe is in the interest of all the people.

He has not brought in a bill, as some would have him do, to commit this Government to the proposition of ignoring the country roads and simply build across the country boulevards in order that the idle rich may joy ride in automobiles from ocean

Let us build the country roads first and then there will be time enough to joy ride.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. Ferris].

[Mr. FERRIS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of supporting the bill now under consideration. I support it because, first, I believe in the principle of Federal aid in the construction and maintenance of good roads throughout the country, and, second, because I pledged myself to this legislation when I was a candidate to represent the people of my district in this Congress

One of the objections which has been raised to this bill is that it is not constitutional. That is usually the excuse offered by those who are not in sympathy with legislation for the benefit of the whole people. Unconstitutional! The Constitution of the United States was established for the benefit of the people and not to hinder them. In the preamble of that instrument the purposes for which it is ordained and established are set forth, and one of those purposes is "to promote the general welfare." I would ask those who oppose this bill what aid could the Federal Government give in the way of an appropriation that would go further in "promoting the general welfare" than this appropriation to cooperate with the States and local communities in building and keeping up good roads? By what other method can the people be made to feel their connection with and interest in this great Government of ours more fully than by aiding them in the building of the roads which lie in front of their doors? I know of nothing that this Government can engage in that will bring greater benefits to all the people or more truly "promote the general welfare" than the work in which we are now engaged.

But, Mr. Chairman, to those who claim that such an appropriation is in violation of the Constitution, I would direct their minds to the provisions of the Constitution itself. Section 8 of Article I provides, among other things, that Congress shall have power "to establish post offices and post roads." A post road is any road over which the mail of the United States is carried or delivered, which includes every rural free delivery route and every star route in the United States. That is all this bill proposes to do. It proposes to aid the States and local communities in building and maintaining post roads. In my own opinion Congress has the power to go even further than that and assist in the construction and maintenance of roads under the commerce clause of the Constitution, giving Congress power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations. And in a bill which I have introduced for the purpose of aiding the good-roads movement I do not limit the appropriation to post roads, but make it apply to other roads as well, where they are used in transporting farm products from the farm to the market. But it is not necessary to discuss that phase of the question, as the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Roads and is now under consideration is limited to post roads.

This question, Mr. Chairman, of Federal aid in the internal improvement of our country is not a new question. Many decades ago men on the floor of this House and in the Senate who have long since gone to their reward advocated internal improvements by the Federal Government, So earnestly and so eloquently did Henry Clay, of Kentucky, plead for Government aid in the internal improvement of this Nation more than 60 years ago that he became known as the "father of internal improvements." It has long been the settled policy of this Government to appropriate money for and to actually conduct improvements on all our navigable streams and in the harbors of the country for the purpose of aiding navigation, and thus aiding commerce "among the several States and with foreign nations." It has also been the settled policy of this Nation for many years to appropriate money out of the Public Treasury for the purpose of reclaiming the arid lands of the West by irrigation and other methods, so that American homes might be found there for American men and women. In fact, the Federal Government has for many years been gradually increasing and extending its assistance to the people in all kinds of enterprises for their betterment and for making this Nation more happy and more prosperous. Our activities along these lines have included such subjects as health, agriculture, science, navigation, aviation, irrigation, transportation, conservation, and other kindred subjects which bear upon the constructive development of our country. Realizing that there is no more serious agricultural or economic question now confronting the American people, Congress and the Democratic Party now propose to recognize the relationship between the farmer and commerce, between the good road and the problem of transportation everywhere, and to assist in this most worthy enterprise. And in this connection it may in the beginning be wise to limit our cooperation to those roads which are used by the United States in carrying the mails; and as rural routes are gradually increased, as we hope they will be, and the experiment proves valuable, we may branch out further in the direction of other constitutional aids to the people in helping to solve their great problems.

While we in the United States have many things of which to boast, and of which we do boast, we must admit that in the construction and maintenance of our public roads we are far behind many of the other nations of the world. This may in part be explained by reason of the fact that they are so old and we are so new, and by the fact that we have been somewhat dazzled by our own unlimited possibilities, in the way of accumulating wealth, developing rapidly the natural resources of the country, and many other economic factors which I do not desire to discuss at this time. But it is a notorious fact that in many portions of the United States the roads are about the most unpromising feature of the country. This comes about in some measure by reason of local conditions and the laws governing the different States. In some of the States aid is given direct by State taxation from the State treasury, the State bearing half the expense and the local community bearing the other half. But in many of the States the burden of road building and road improvement is borne wholly by the local community. By reason of the limitations placed on the amount of taxes that may be raised by any county or other subdivision of the State, it is a financial impossibility to secure enough money by taxation to build a system of permanent roads. It is about all the average county can do to raise enough money to keep its roads and bridges in reasonable repair, with little left for building perma-nent roads. So that, if the people who have heretofore borne the full burden of these taxes and these expenses are to be rewarded with a system of highways which will be permanent and adequate, it is plain to me that some aid must come from the outside. Where else can or ought we to go except to the Government of the United States, which is the Government of all the people, big and little, high and low, rich and poor, farmer, merchant, lawyer, laboring man, and all other vocations which might be enumerated?

It is stated by those who have made a study of the question, and I have no doubt of its truthfulness, that in England, France, and Germany, where the roads are perhaps more universally improved than anywhere else, the average cost of transporting farm products from the farm to the market is from 9 to 12 cents per ton per mile, and in the United States, where our roads are not improved to any great extent, it costs about 28 cents per ton per mile to haul the farmer's products from his farm to the market. In other words, in France, England, or Germany, where their roads are practically all improved it Germany, where their roads are practically all improved, it costs a farmer about 90 cents to haul a ton of farm products a distance of 9 miles, but in the United States it costs him about $2.50 to haul the same amount of produce the same distance. This is accounted for in the length of time lost, wear and tear upon the teams, wagons, and other implements, and other elements that must be accounted in estimating the value of a man's time and the depreciation in his property.

We have heard much complaint in recent years on account of the high cost of living. It might be well for our economists to account for this difference in the cost of transportation in the United States in estimating and arriving at the reason for the high cost of living. Though this, of course, is only an element of that cost, among many others, it is of sufficient importance to arouse our attention and call for our best efforts in solving

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Has the gentleman from Kentucky any information as to the average haul in those countries compared with the average haul here?

Mr. BARKLEY. My information is that in the old countries the average haul is about 9½ miles.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. What is it here?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is the same. The cost per ton-mile is predicated upon the same mileage in this country as compared with the other countries. This difference in the United States by reason of the loss of time, wear and tear upon farm machinery and implements and teams, and depreciation, and other items which must be taken into account, amounts to a loss to the American farmers of anywhere from $250,000,000 to $500,-000,000 every year, by reason of the unimproved condition of our roads.

So, Mr. Chairman, as an economic proposition, appealing to Congress from its economic and commercial standpoint alone, it is in the interest of lowering the cost of living, of promoting more efficiency and better conditions of agriculture throughout the country for the United States Government to appropriate the money provided in this bill, which is a mere pittance compared with the total of its other expenditures

Mr. Chairman, there are three things which, in my opinion, add to and promote very materially the civilization and improvement of our rural population. One is the country church, to which the man in the country takes his family to worship the God of his fathers according to the dictates of his conscience. Another is the country schoolhouse, to which the man in the country sends his children to obtain that knowledge which will enable them in future years to attain success in life. The other is the country road, over which the people must travel, not only to church and to school, but to the market with their products, and in that social and neighborly communication which adds so much to the attractiveness and purity of country life. And I might add, as a fourth element, the free rural mail delivery, which brings the daily paper, the magazine, and other sources of communication and education to the door of the farmer every morning. There can be no denial of the true importance of these institutions—the church, the school, the road, and the free delivery of mail—in bringing about higher standards of mor-ality, higher standards of education, and better standards of living throughout the expanse of this great land. And anything that Congress may do that will aid the farmer and his boy and girl in elevating morality, education, and civilization is a worthy and economical work and one in which we may be proud to engage. [Applause.]

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will, if I have the time.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he believed in the system of roads provided for in this bill that would lead from the country to the town market, or did he believe in another system that has been proposed of crosscountry roads?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I know what is in the There are two schools of advocates of gentleman's mind. Government aid for roads in this country. One school believes that the Government ought to appropriate large sums of money for the purpose of building great national highways, or a few of them, from one ocean to the other, or from one great city to the other, not because such roads would aid in solving the problem of transportation for the average farmer, but because such a road upon which the Government had expended a large sum would then afford a boulevard for the enjoyment of those who were seeking pleasure. The other school believes that if the Government goes down into the people's Treasury and appropriates money for roads, that money ought to be spent where the people, the common people, if you please, who bear the burdens of the Government in time of peace and win its battles in time of war, may receive some benefit from the expenditure of their money. I belong to the latter school. I believe that when the Government spends its money in enterprises of this kind it ought to be spent where it will benefit all the people as nearly as possible and not for the benefit of a few. upon a public road as a public necessity and not an avenue of pleasure or luxury merely. If all our roads were improved, the man who wants to use them for pleasure can do so as well as the man who wants to haul his corn or his wheat or his tobacco to the market. But if we spend all our money on one great highway from ocean to ocean, while it would be valuable to those who happened to live upon it, it would afford no benefit to the great masses of our people who need good roads and need them now. [Applause.]

If that answers the gentleman's question, I hope he will stand with me on that question. The money appropriated for a public road is appropriated because of the necessity of traveling over it, to enable the farmer to transport more easily and more swiftly and more cheaply his products from farm to market. If somebody who has the time to enjoy them finds pleasure in traveling over them for the sake of pleasure, all well and good. Let him enjoy them. But let us provide for the necessities of life before we try to capture the luxuries. The improvement of our country roads will benefit not only the farmer but the man in the city by lessening the cost of transportation and the cost of living and add to the convenience and happiness of every citizen. [Applause.]

We have heard much, Mr. Chairman, of late years concerning the tendency of the people, and especially of the young men of the country, to leave the country and go to the city. We have seen conventions of bankers, of lawmakers, of social economists, and eminent men in all walks of life trying to find the reason for this migration from country and to find some remedy for it. In my opinion one of the reasons why so many young men prefer to leave the country and go to the city has been on account of the hardships that in many sections of the country have heretofore existed in farm life; the inconveniences and the disadvantages and other elements entering into the causes of discontent which have led many a young man away from the farm. Many of your bright, stalwart, vigorous, and honest young men upon the farm have been lured to the city by reason of what seemed to be a brighter prospect, greater opportunity, offered in the city. Some have been lured by the love of comfort and their unwillingness to undergo the hardships which they thought existed on the farm, forgetting that their fathers and grandfathers had undergone hardships and privations and sacrifices never dreamed of in our generation. may be the cause, I believe it to be our duty here to aid and encourage better conditions of farm life, more scientific methods of agriculture, and thus aid the farmer in solving the great problem of feeding and clothing the world. There is no greater calling than that of tilling the soil.

The man who keeps close to nature and listens to her voice in the morning as the sun comes up and hears the drowsy tinkling of the cowbell in the evening ought to be a happy man. The boy who is raised out in the country, with the fresh air. the sunshine, and the pure ideals that are cherished in a Christian home where the love of God and home and country fills the human heart, ought to be a happy boy. The girl who tosses her golden locks among the apple blossoms as she climbs the apple tree and sings the sweet melodies she has heard her mother sing ought to be a happy girl. And any legislation which we may enact here that may by its results encourage these boys and these girls to remain in the country and bring about conditions where farm life will be comfortable, attractive, and profitable to them even more than it is to-day will be beneficial to the country at large and add to the sum total of our greatness. [Applause.]

We can not, Mr. Chairman, overlook our duty in this Congress to the farmer. As I suggested awhile ago, the farmer feeds and clothes the world; and as the years go by and population increases each acre of land must feed and clothe more people than it did the year before. It is beginning to be necessary to reclaim and rejuvenate the old worn-out land that our grandfathers cleared up, wore out, and then abandoned, in order that it may be utilized in this great problem of agriculture. The Government is aiding in this somewhat, but it has only been of recent years that the Government has enlarged its efforts to aid the farmer. It first established the Department of Agriculture, which has grown and will continue to grow and become the most important branch of the Federal Government. A department of agriculture is usually more beneficial and more in keeping with the principles of our Government than a department of war, though that department, too, is sometimes necessary. More recently the farmer has been given the free delivery of his mails, which has been a great boon to him in every way. Later the parcel post has been provided for him, which enables him to utilize the United States mail in transporting that which he has to the city and that which he wants from the city. We are now seeking to provide for him a better road over which that mail will travel and over which he may travel himself in his daily communications with the world. Let us hope also that before this Congress shall have adjourned we may provide for him a law that will make it easier for him to secure that credit which he may need to finance his farm and build his home at rates of interest that will be at once fair and reasonable.

If we shall be able at this session of Congress to enact, in addition to what we are now trying to do, a really constructive and adequate rural credits bill, which will afford facilities for borrowing money on terms at least equal to that of others in this and other countries, we will have performed a duty the result of which can not be measured in a year or a generation. I am confident that under the wise leadership of our great Democratic President, Woodrow Wilson, we shall be able to accomplish this task, as we have accomplished others since the 4th of last March. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say that I hope this bill will pass this House almost with a unanimous voice. I believe that it will receive more votes in its favor in proportion to the membership than any bill of similar importance during this session. When that is accomplished, we will have gone far in convincing the people of our country that we are honestly seeking to enlarge their opportunities, to enhance their welfare, and cause them to feel a close personal interest in the conduct of their Government. Under the provisions of this bill each State will receive that portion of the fund to which its population and rural post-road mileage will entitle it. For instance, Kentucky will receive about $583,000 each year, which will in turn go to each of the counties in such proportion as may be provided by law, thus supplementing the amount that can be raised by local taxation for the purpose of improving roads. Who is able to predict what a revolution in the building and improvement of our roads 10 years will bring, by reason of this encouragement from the National Government? Let us hope that the people of all the States will gladly take advantage of this cooperation and reap its benefits a hundredfold in all that goes to make life happier, communication easier, and the people more contented in the enjoyment of a genuine and permanent prosperity. [Applause.]
Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR].

[Mr. ADAIR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield five minutes to my colleague from Missouri [Mr. Rucker]. [Applause.]

[Mr. RUCKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Fields].

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I am in hearty accord with the bill now under consideration, known as the good roads bill, and shall give it my earnest support. I do not support this bill because I believe it is absolutely correct in every detail, but because the principle upon which it rests is both sound and correct, and because in doing so I exercise the dictates of my own judgment and reflect the sentiment of the constituency which I represent.

The bill is not all that I would have it be. If left to me to frame, coming from that class of districts that have been so long neglected by the Federal Government, namely, an agricultural district, I would make the general appropriation larger and increase the sum per mile to be expended in the improvement of both dirt and macadamized roads. In fact, the greatest objection to the bill is that it does not appropriate as much money as it should; but it is a step in the right direction, which will ultimately lead to more extensive improvements in our public highways, and by so doing will carry the support of the Government to every section of the country, which will benefit the farmer, because it will lighten his burdens of getting his products to market. It will benefit the city dweller who consumes those products, because it will lessen the cost of transportation, which he must ultimately pay.

This bill, Mr. Chairman, if it becomes a law-and I have no doubt that it will-will mark the beginning of a new epoch in the legislative history of our country. It will of itself be evidence that the National Congress has at last turned its attention to the rural sections and the farmers, upon whom the Nation as a whole must depend for its food, its wealth, and its prosperity for the future. The cause of Federal aid for public highways has been advocated in this body and on this floor for many years by a few who came from the farm and were in touch with the rural life; but their contentions have repeatedly been met with the theory that legislation of this character was unconstitutional and that it would conflict with State rights, and the further arguments that such expenditures of the public funds were unwarranted from an economic standpoint, all of which contributed to the defeat of the legislation. But those objec-tions have been repudiated by public sentiment, and the pro-ponents of these measures have pressed forward and battled onward and have been encouraged by the people back home with the blessed assurance that their course and their efforts had been approved. Other sections of the country likewise encouraged them by electing to Congress men fresh from the farm and men thoroughly in touch and in full sympathy with the farmers' needs, until to-day the farmer and producer, who constitute the bulwark of the Nation, hold the balance of power in this body.

Only a few years ago, Mr. Chairman, the farmer knocked in vain for admittance to this Chamber. That he is here now, and in control of his rights, is evidenced by this and other legislation passed by this Congress. He asserted his rights in the writing of the tariff law by eliminating from it that feature of taxation which had lain so heavily upon him through tariff-protected fence wire, farming implements, harness, and lumber, the prime necessities in fencing and tilling his soil and building his home. In writing the currency bill into law we opened a new avenue of credit to the farmer by permitting the national banks to make five-year loans on farm lands, a privilege hitherto denied him five-year loans on farm lands, a privilege hitherto denied him. and to-day, Mr. Chairman, we are opening a new avenue of commerce to him through the rural sections by appropriating money with which to improve the roads over which he must haul his products, and I trust that it may not be long until Federal aid will be extended to our institutions of learning until there will be an industrial, vocational, and agricultural school within reach of every community. When we shall have accomplished these reforms we can then realize in its fullness the beauty and truthfulness of the doctrine that the soil is the greatest asset, and the sons and daughters the greatest heritage of the race.

I referred a while ago to the objections to this legislation on the grounds that the principles embodied in it were in conflict with State rights, and the same objection is urged by those opposed to Federal aid for education. In answer to these objections I want to say that I stand as ready and as willing to defend my State against Federal invasion of her sovereign rights as does any man in this body. But I am unwilling to agree that Federal legislation which will improve local conditions in any State and bring prosperity and happiness to its people is an invasion of its sovereign rights. I was taught in my school days that in the science of government for every right there was a corresponding duty. And that principle applies with reference to the attitude of the Federal Government toward the States. The Federal Government in admitting the States to statehood reserved to itself the right to construct military roads, post roads, and routes of interstate commerce; and it is its duty to maintain these highways in such a way as will render them suitable and adequate for the purpose for which they were intended. And, on the other hand, it is the duty of each State to contribute its just proportion to the life and maintenance of the Federal Government, and with that duty there is the corresponding right of each State to demand of the Federal Government its just proportion of public improvements constructed by the Government. Has this been done in the past? I answer "No." Those who believe that this Government is composed only of cities, seacoasts, and navigable streams, as was evidenced here in the passage of the last public-buildings bill, would differ with me on this question; and I shall digress for a moment to refer to what occurred then. When the public-buildings bill was under discussion some of the gentlemen from the large cities, with their magnificent Federal buildings that had cost millions of dollars from the public funds, threw up their hands in holy horror when it was proposed to construct post-office buildings in several of the small cities of the country; and others from the coast and navigable rivers, where almost countless millions of the Federal Treasury have been spent for the construction and maintenance of ports and harbors and the canalization of streams, contended most vociferously that it was a waste of public funds. But notwithstanding their protest the bill was passed, which was evidence that the spirit that had so long diverted the attention of Congress from the smaller cities, the villages, and rural sections was no longer in control. Chairman, I trust that I may not be misunderstood in my reference to the Federal improvements in the great cities, on the coasts, and in the navigable streams. The public business in the cities necessitated the construction of public buildings. coastwise trade with foreign nations and national safety against foreign invasion necessitated the construction of ports of entry and harbors of defense. Our interstate traffic necessitated the improvement of our navigable streams. And just as these interests demand Federal aid, so do our interstate relations between man and man, between city and country, between societies of the different sections, demand it, alike in proportion to their contributions to the Federal Government. Why, Mr. Chairman, one who was not familiar with country life would almost be convinced by some of the gentlemen from the cities that the rural sections do not constitute a part of the Federal Government and are not entitled to recognition by or aid from the Government. But let me remind them that the farmer in the field, the woodman in the forest, the teamster and rural carrier on the road, the merchant at the cross-roads store, and the village dweller pay their taxes and contribute to the revenues of the Federal Government the same as the man in the city, on the coast, or the navigable stream, and has the same rights as a citizen and is entitled to the same recognition by the Govern-

Mr. Chairman, there is another phase of the subject which I wish to discuss briefly, and that is the benefits to be derived through this legislation aside from the money that it appropriates, which is the knowledge of road building that it diffuse among the people of the country. This will result in a revival of their interest in public roads; it will lead to a better knowledge of how and of what material to construct roads; it will bring them in sympathy with the good-roads movement; it will give the people of every section an opportunity to ascertain the difference between good and bad roads, which will ultimately result in the improvement of all the roads. In speaking of the difference between good and bad roads I do not speak from hearsay or draw on my imagination. I speak from actual knowledge, acquired from the district which I represent, which is composed of 19 counties, 8 of which are blue-grass counties with macadamized roads. The others are mountain counties, 1 of which has turnpikes and the other 10 have dirt roads. I have traveled every section of that district and most of it time and time again by every character or kind of conveyance in use there, which has made me thoroughly familiar with the hardships and disadvantages attendant to bad roads and the advantages to be derived from good roads, and, being a farmer myself, I naturally paid particular attention to the work being carried on by the farmers, the prices of land, and the cost of transportation of farm products. I find that the land lying near the pikes in the blue-grass regions selis for from 25 to 50 per cent more than land of similar surface and equal fertility which lies inconvenient or inaccessible to the turnpikes, and in one mountain county that has pikes the land sells for twice and often three times as much as land of similar surface and equal fertility in other counties where the roads are dirt roads and in bad repair. I have seen the farmers haul their products to market on both the pikes and dirt roads. On the average pike one team will haul from 11 to 2 tons of tobacco and make an average trip of 20 miles and return in one day. On the dirt roads one team will haul on an average road from one-half to three-fourths of a ton of tobacco and make an average trip of 10 miles and return in one day. Therefore on this calculation, which is a fair one, it costs the man on the dirt road four times what it costs the man on the pike to market his products, which is conclusive proof that the mud tax is the greatest, most excessive, and most burdensome tax that the farmer pays. So, in view of the fact that the life of the Nation is dependent upon the success of the farm, can any man in reason contend that it is not economical and that it is not profitable for the Government to expend money in the construc-tion and maintenance of roads into and through the farming sections? The man who would make such contention is ignorant of the interest that even the city has, or should have, in the success of the farm.

Mr. Chairman, there is another phase of the subject upon which I will touch if time will permit me, and that is the educational advantages derived through good roads. In one of the counties of my district where they have macadamized roads leading to every adjoining county they have organized their several public schools into groups and merged each group into a central school. The children are conveyed to and from school in elegantly equipped wagons built for that purpose. These wagons are covered, which gives protection to the little ones from the scorching heat of the summer sun and the chilling blast of the winter's storm. This system insures the regular attendance of the children and their continuous interest in the school; and I am advised by the superintendent of public schools of that county that the system has proven a marvelous success from the standpoint of both interest in the schools and economy in the school funds. I attended an educational association in that county not long since, and the success of the system was evidenced by the presence of 3,000 bright school children of the county and a most magnificent display of live stock, agricultural products, fancy needlework, and artistic paintings and drawings, all of which was produced by the boys and girls of the school; a display of which any county or State fair might well be proud. And, Mr. Chairman, the basic principle upon which and through which this marvelous success was attained was good roads. That county has splendid roads, which enables the people to consolidate their schools and bring their children together in school capacity and educational conventions—an advantage that the good people of several of the counties of my district and my State do not enjoy, for the reason that their roads are rugged and their streams are unbridged. But while my heart goes out to the hundreds, yea, the thousands, of bright boys and girls of my district and State who are so handicapped in attending school, especially through the winter season, because of the inadequate roads and unbridged streams over which many of them must travel, I am still optimistic on the subject. In the language of the immortal Adams, "Through the gloom of the present I see the brightness of the future." I hear in the not far distant future the voice of the Federal Government speaking, as it were, in tones of thunder, that these disadvantages, these barriers, shall be removed; that every section of this Union of States shall share equally with every other section at the hands of the Government; that the farmer who feeds the Nation shall share the blessings to which he is justly entitled; and that his posterity shall have every advantage necessary to prepare them for their future responsibilities. And when this shall come even those who oppose this bill will sing anew the glory of our Nation and the honor of its flag. [Applause.] Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY]. Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of this bill, known as the bill for Federal aid for roads, by Mr. Shackleford of Missouri, I might be pardoned in referring to my discussion of this question on the stump in my State in 1910, and which I repeat here. I then said:

"Good roads and bridges and facilities for travel; the transportation of vehicles, farm products, and passengers are more important to an advancing civilization than any other element of progress-laws in aid of the same are those in which every citizen in the State is interested and directly benefited. roads increase the motor power of the farmer's team, shorten his distance to market, increase the freight facilities, make possible rural free delivery and the parcel post, aid in education, and make easy the building of rural high schools; they build towns, cities, and marts of trade, increase the sales of the mer-chant, improve the condition of society, make more attractive the home, and exhilarate the march of civilization and human progress."

I have always declared that too much money could not be spent for public roads and for schools if honestly managed and spent for public rolds and for schools it holestly managed and economically applied, but it is unnecessary here to discuss the necessity for good roads. The question is, first, should the Federal Government enter upon this policy; and if so, what should that policy be? To these two questions I shall briefly address myself. To the first I answer that the demand is so tremendous for Federal aid that it is useless to resist this demand longer. It partakes of the nature of the contest prior to the Civil War over the policy of "internal improvements," which finally came, as appropriations for road legislation must inevitably follow. As to the constitutionality of such legislation, there can be no doubt under the Constitution of the United States of the power of the Federal Government to make roads for the following purposes:

First. Military roads for the transportation of troops and military supplies.

Second. In aid of interstate commerce.

Third. To facilitate the transportation of the mails.

Since we have built up throughout the country a very elaborate system of railways and waterways, there is no need of interstate roads-roads that run across one State into another State or crossing boundary lines of different States—unless it should be the policy of the Government to construct roads either in competition with the railroads or to facilitate automobile travel; and, in my opinion, it should attempt neither, and I would oppose any legislation or appropriation for either of these purposes. And since the Government has the right to use the railroads for the transportation of troops and military supplies, there is no need of entering upon road building for mili-purposes.

This leaves only one other constitutional power, and that is to construct post roads; and since post roads, for the large part, and especially rural free delivery routes, run from the town to the farm and from the farm back to town or the market, it would appear that it would be wholesome to exercise this constitutional power; and hence it answers the question as to the policy that should be pursued, and brings us directly to the issue of whether the House bill by Representative Shackle-FORD, of Missouri, or Senate bill 3545, introduced by Senator Gore, of Oklahoma, should be the policy. Or, to place the question in other language, whether Federal aid should be given to the State as an aid and encouragement, the funds given to be under the control of the State authorities, subject only to the conditions of the law as provided in the Shackleford bill, or whether the Federal Government itself should enter into the policy of road building, having a great department of roads in Washington and the construction maintained under the control of the Federal Government through the Department of Agriculture, as provided by the Senate bill. To this provision of the Senate bill I am opposed, whether the appropriation be small or large, because I am opposed to the policy or the attempt of the Federal Government to do anything which the States can do for themselves, because Federal building of roads would ultimately mean interstate "cross-the-country" roads, or "peacock boulevards," which would be used for the most part for automobile tourists. I am not particularly opposed to automobiles but while in that connection I am of the cripton that mobiles, but while in that connection I am of the opinion that there should be provided regular automobile roads just wide enough for an automobile, and take them off of the public highway, so that they would not interfere with travel by horses and would not at the same time so quickly wear out the roads. It is demonstrated not only in the various States of the East but through the Department of Agriculture of the Federal Government that an automobile will tear up a macadamized road or a cement road and that no stone or other material is hard enough to prevent rapid deterioration under a heavy automobile traffic; that about the only road, according to a bulletin of the Department of Agriculture, that will stand the traffic is a road made wholly of oil, when the oil is forced into sand roads sufficient to make a compact. flexible surface, otherwise it will wear into ruts and blow away with the winds.

Let us analyze the difference between the Senate bill and the House bill. Under the Senate bill there is $1,000,000 appropriated, with a strong discretionary power as to the use of the money in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, and because of the smallness of the amount it would be scarcely sufficient to build one road across a State, leaving the other portions of the State to wait, in some instances, 50 years before they would get this Federal aid. I say this would follow by reason of the very smallness of the appropriation, and that the advocates of this policy, who defeated the Shackleford bill after it passed the House in the last Congress, the author of the Senate bill I am now referring to voting against it; and we further know that the automobile companies who make and place upon the market automobiles boast that they defeated this bill in the Senate. It seems that while the Members of Congress understand the contest and the issues growing out of the defeat of that bill in the last Congress that the country does not realize the issue. To make a more concrete illustration of these two bills permit me to apply these two bills as they would affect my State—Oklahoma. Under the Shackleford bill Oklahoma would receive one half of the total appropriation proportioned to the population that Oklahoma bears to the other States, and the other half apportioned to the mail routes, which has been figured by the experts of the department to amount to $572,500 for Oklahoma. This sum thus appropriated to Oklahoma to be divided among all the counties in the State in like proportion, under the bill, conditioned upon the State, county, or road district putting up an equal amount, which would mean the expenditure in the whole State year after year of $1,145,000, one half of which is paid by the people of Oklahoma, the other half by the Federal Government. This money could be used on a given post road to fill up the bog holes or tear down the hills and lessen the grade, and then the following year a like sum would be used to continue to improve the same roads, so that each and every year every county in the State, as would every county in every other State, would receive its pro rata share, and by a continuation of the policy for a period of 10 or 15 years all the roads would, by degrees, without bonds, for future generations and scarcely without being felt, become improved to a tolerable condition. Whereas, under the Senate bill before referred to, introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma, Oklahoma would get $105,000, about, which would be so infinitesimally small, even with an equal amount by the State, that in the very nature of the practical use it could not serve any beneficial purpose by prorating it among all the counties, and in fact no provision is made therefor, and hence it would have to be applied on some cross-the-State highways. Great project, indeed, but of little benefit to the people. It would be in the end nothing more than an automobile route.

The real limitations of the Gore bill are contained in the first section by this provision:

Highway work may be inaugurated in each State through the cooperation of the United States Department of Agriculture and the highway department of the several States. Such cooperation shall embrace practical demonstration in road construction and maintenance upon highways to be selected by the Secretary of Agriculture and the State highway department, and all such work shall be carried on in such manner as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and the representative of the several State highway departments.

It is easily foretold in my State what will become of this money. It would be first used to construct a roadway across the State of Oklahoma from Kansas to Denison, Tex. It is true this road would run through my county, but what would become of the counties east and west of it? No appropriation will be just that does not take care of every county in the State.

Hence I plant my position upon the policy that the Govern-

Hence I plant my position upon the policy that the Government of the United States ought not to enter into road building, but that an appropriation should be prorated among the States and should be used solely upon the post roads so as to create roads from the farm to the market and from the market to the farm. My conviction of a wise governmental policy is that this will aid the merchant, the market or marts of trade, and will aid the farmer, and that it links together both the interest of the city and the country, so that neither need feel that he is unnecessarily burdened or taxed either by the State or the Federal Government for improvements that he does not receive.

The amount of this appropriation seems large, it is true, but we appropriated last year for the Navy Department $105,-274,948.53, and to build battleships $35,525,695—this does not include the War Department—and are now called upon to build a railroad in Alaska that will amount to $40,000,000. This appropriation of $25,000,000 for the whole United States under the Shackleford bill, that will be appropriated to all the States and to all the countles of the States, is insignificant when compared with this for-war appropriation.

To recapitulate: First, I am opposed to the Government's attempt to build "cross-the-country peacock boulevards," which can only be used for automobile traffic, until we have good roads in every county throughout the United States, which will take many, many years to accomplish.

Second, I am opposed to exercising the constitutional power for building roads for military purposes except within and around the military posts.

Third, I am opposed to the Government itself entering upon the policy of road building, but I am in favor of an appropriation to the States in aid of road building, but to be controlled by the States, the States to determine what material to use in each section within the State, and that such appropriation in aid of roads by the Federal Government shall be used exclusively under the one constitutional power to facilitate the carrying of mails, because the mails in every State are carried along the same roads that the farmer travels to go to the market. Of all of the three constitutional powers, this is the only one that ought to be used in this policy. Therefore I am in favor of the House bill by Shackleford, which passed the House two years ago but was defeated in the Senate, and I am opposed to the Senate bill before referred to.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, some of the speakers apparently do not take this bill seriously. At the same time, I think they regard the proposition pending before the committee as one of the most important presented to Congress for consideration in many years. This bill provides that the United States shall in certain cases aid the States and certain subdivisions thereof in the care and maintenance of rural post roads, and is justified under section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, which provides that "Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads." I have always entertained the opinion that the primary duty rested with the States and the civil subdivisions thereof to provide the funds with which to construct and maintain public roads. Many of the States in the Union have, at large expense and the imposition of local taxation, provided splendid systems of highways. In the State of Missouri much has been done along this line in years past. With the establishment of rural free delivery greater interest is taken than ever before in good roads.

The automobile is coming into general use, and the demand is becoming more insistent every day for good roads. I represent one of the best agricultural districts in the United States. I have an intelligent and progressive constituency. They appreciate the need for better roads and are making great efforts to secure same. I have not a town or city in my district of more than 5,000 inhabitants. The population for the most part is a rural population, and the provisions of this bill will appeal to them strongly. One of the southernmost counties of my district—Clay lies just across the river from Kansas City, one of the best markets in the West for the products of the farms of my district. St. Joseph, Mo., also is in easy reach from all parts of the district. Then, lines of railroad traverse the district, having terminals in these thriving cities; hence the farmers of my district are deeply interested in the maintenance of good roads from the farms to the towns in the district and to the shipping points on these railroads, that they may have ready access to the markets. During the decade from 1900 to 1910 my district lost 25,000 in population. Many reasons have been assigned for this loss of population. I attribute it in part to what has been regarded by the rural population as the unattractiveness of farm life. The tendency has been for young men and young women to leave the farm and go to the cities. One of the principal factors, however, contributing to this result has been the very great increase in farm values and the disposition on the part of farmers having small tracts of land to take advantage of the high price and dispose of their land and go farther West, in the hope that they might secure more and cheaper land for themselves and their families; but in many instances, as I have stated, it was on account of what was regarded as the unattractiveness of farm life. The fact that better school privileges might be enjoyed and better opportunities for self-culture has induced many ambitious young men and women to leave the farm; but with the coming of the telephone and the rural carrier service and the parcel post and the many conveniences that our farmers now enjoy and with which they are surrounding themselves in the home, I have every reason to believe this condition will not continue, and I am quite sure that nothing will contribute more to the attractiveness and charm of farm life than good roads and better schools. In my State at the session of the legislature in 1913 an act was passed providing that rural schools may be grouped, that we may have central high schools in the different townships instead of a great number of rural schools, as in the past. Provision may be made for the transportation of pupils to and from school, the expense of these schools to be maintained in part by the State and in part by local taxation.

As I have stated, the fact that the country schools have not been up to the stal dard of the town and city schools was one reason why the youth were leaving the farm. It is the wish of the farmer to give his children the best educational advantages, so they may have an equal chance in the race of life. steps taken in Missouri to reorganize and consolidate school districts for the purpose of maintaining elementary schools and high schools are wise, and should have the hearty support of the farmers. If we could only have roads, specifications for which are set out in classes A, B, and C of this bill, it will increase farm values. It will be of distinct value to the farms lying more remote from the town, because they will be brought nearer the market. Much time will be saved to the farmer and much expense. The time when it may not be seasonable to work on the farm can be utilized in hauling the products of the farm to the market. There are months in the year now, particularly the months of March and April, when the roads in some localities are impassable. At the same time little can be done on the farm and much time is lost to the farmer. If we can have good roads for the year round, then the farmer can utilize the roads at his convenience and at such times as his labor can not be used profitably on the farm. Good roads will bring him not only nearer to the schools but nearer to the country church, as well as to the town. It will save much in the way of wear and tear on his equipment, and one team can render the service now required of two during many months of the year when the roads are bad. My hope is that with better rural schools and better roads added to our Rural Delivery Service and the parcel post and the many comforts and conveniences in the home with which our farmers are now surrounding themselves, this exodus from the farm will cease, and that at the end of the next decade the census will show a healthy increase in our rural population. The demand for farm products is becoming greater every year. Consumption has overtaken production, and already much of our food supply is being drawn from foreign markets. I have taken deep interest in scientific agriculture. I have spared no pains to bring to the farmers in my district the latest and best information in the way of farmers' bulletins, yearbooks, horse and cattle books issued by the Agriculture Department.

So far as the provisions of this bill are concerned I am inclined to agree with my colleague from Missouri, Judge Rucker, that the provision made in the bill for roads in class C is too small. The bill provides that roads of class C shall embrace roads upon which no incline is steeper than is reasonably necessary in view of the natural topography of the locality, with adequate drainage and ample side ditches, with a roadway constructed so as to quickly shed water into the side ditches and kept crowned and compacted by dragging or other adequate means, so that it shall be reasonably passable for wheeled vehicles. In other words, roads of class C are what we call dirt roads, while roads of class A are to be composed of macadam or other material of equal utility and cost, constructed and maintained in such manner that it shall have a smooth, firm surface, and roads of class B shall embrace roads composed of shells, gravel, or a proper combination of sand and clay or other material of equal utility but less expensive than macadam constructed and maintained in such manner that it shall have a smooth, firm surface. I will be glad before this debate closes if some member of the committee will explain why it is that $60 per mile may be expended on roads of class A and $30 per mile on roads of class B and only $15 per mile on roads of class C, or the dirt roads. There are portions of my district where rock is abundant and we may have macadam roads at a reasonable cost, but there are other portions of my district where the lands are rich and attractive and the rock for road construction is not available, and by reason of the depth of soil these roads are very bad in certain seasons of the year and will require a large expenditure of money to properly construct and maintain them.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is not that an answer as to why we should pay more for the macadam road than for the dirt road to encourage the people to build the more expensive and useful road in those sections where you are annoyed by the mud. While a dirt road must answer in many places, in the richest land the gentleman speaks of the people have wealth and disposition enough to step from the dirt road to the higher class of road.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is no lack of interest on the part of the farmer that he will not have the best class of road. They want the best kind of road, and they would undoubtedly prefer the macadam road, but in many sections the rock is not available, unless hauled great distances and at great cost.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to speak at length with reference to the provisions of this bill. The bill has my hearty approval. While the aggregate sum, $25,000,000, is large, yet when it is distributed to the several States the amount that may be used per mile in the construction and maintenance of roads is very inconsiderable. The duty will still rest with the States and the subdivisions of the States to provide by far the greater part of the funds with which to construct public roads. I believe the passage of this bill will stimulate greater interest in good roads and that for every dollar appropriated by this bill to be expended for good roads many dollars will be raised by taxation and by voluntary contributions in the different States for good-road purposes. The farmers are not the only ones to be benefited by the improvement of our rural post roads. The people in our cities and towns and villages will share equally with them in benefits that may accrue from good roads. I am a firm believer in good roads. Years ago, as a member of the General Assembly of Missouri, I gave a large part of my time to public-highway legislation. I wish to congratulate my colleague from Missouri, Judge Shackleford, upon his indefatigable labor in promoting this legislation. I shall heartily support the bill.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from

Mr. PROUTE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Shreve].

Mr. Shreve. Mr. Chairman, I desire to give my unqualified indorsement to the bill now pending before the House. It has already received practically the unanimous approval of the Committee on Roads, of which I have the honor to be a

The entire country is deeply interested in this legislation. This bill not only provides for the construction and maintenance of macadam, concrete, and brick roads, but also includes the dirt road, the road after all that is most used. Under this bill it will be possible for the National Government to aid in the construction and maintenance of the dirt road which enables the farmer to deliver his products to the railway station or market town-roads that lead everywhere, over which are transported the products of the Nation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would it be agreeable to the gentleman to yield there?
Mr. SHREVE, Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. How does this bill provide for aid in construction or maintenance of any of those roads? It provides it shall be paid after the roads have been constructed. Mr. SHREVE. Section 3 covers it.

I firmly believe that Government assistance, as far as practicable, should be extended to the many rather than the few; by that I mean that assistance should be rendered to the interior and remote parts of the country where the travel is suffi-Such a system of assistance once established, cient to warrant. soon the roads that are more extensively traveled will naturally receive assistance according to their needs and requirements.

As the dirt roads are improved each year and the communities through which they pass are developed the main thorough-fares will be converted into macadam or other form of roads under the bill designated as class A roads. There will be a rapid transition from one class to another.

If we properly connect the farm with the town, the town with the city, we will add materially to the successful progress of our people, bringing denied privileges to the many tollers and tillers of the soil. We can thus elevate the noble calling of agriculture by attracting many city dwellers back to the soil, and by placing the producer in close relation to the consumer we will materially reduce the high cost of living.

Under this bill the National Government and various States will be able to work out a general coordinate system of highways extending through the length and breadth of our land.

The Secretary of Agriculture, on behalf of the United States, may aid the States and the subdivisions thereof in the construction and maintenance of rural roads in an amount not exceeding $25,000,000 in any fiscal year; and the portion thereof which may be expended in any State in any fiscal year being determined upon the basis of one-half in the proportion which the total population of such State bears to the total population of all of the States, as shown by the next preceding Federal census; and one-half in the proportion which the total number of miles of rural post reads in use in such State bears to the total number of miles of rural post roads in use in all of the States is fair and reasonable.

The bill provides ample elasticity to meet the wants of any State, whether in construction of macadam or other high-grade road or the ordinary dirt road provided for in Class B of section 4 of the bill. It also safeguards the Federal funds, and under section 3 requires that-under section 3 requires that—

The Secretary of Agriculture and the officer or officers of each State having lawful power to act for the State and jointly consider and determine the roads in such State which, under the provisions of this section, may be constructed and maintained during the next fiscal year, and the material, character, and manner of such construction and maintenance; that such construction and maintenance shall be conducted under such supervision as shall have been previously agreed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture and said officer or officers of said State; that in no case shall the United States bear more than one-half of the cost of the construction of any road under the provisions of this section; that the Secretary of Agriculture shall not commence such joint construction of any road in any State until the portion of the cost thereof which is to be provided otherwise than by the United States has been made available.

Mr. MOORE Will my colleague yield?

Mr. MOORE. Will my colleague yield? Mr. SHREVE. Certainly. Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman think these sums of $60, $30, and $15 per mile, respectively, will be of material benefit in the construction of these roads?

Mr. SHREVE. It will be a material benefit in the main-tenance of the roads and will tend to encourage the building of a better class of roads.

Under this bill three different classes of highways are recognized which will cover the requirements of every community. Under its operation it will be possible to open the great highways of commerce so they will reach out to the farm. Never before has the demand for farm labor been so great and the requirements of farmers so pronounced as now. Let us begin to increase our supply of wealth at its source. Good roads will equalize the disproportion that now exists between the producer and the consumer. Increasing the city population on the one hand and decreasing farm population on the other has brought about a condition which demands our consideration.

The establishment of parcel post has created a new condition of affairs. The rural mail carrier now has to provide himself with a different equipment for handling the mail, the capital invested in horses, wagons, harness, and so forth, and the expenses of the upkeep are considerable. The Government is asking greater efficiency and more strenuous effort without material advance in pay. It therefore seems opportune that the Government about the contract of the contr ment should inaugurate a great and just policy of Federal aid in the construction and maintenance of post roads. The farmer and rural mail carrier are not the only persons interested in good roads. It is a problem that is demanding the attention of all our people. The producer, the consumer are alike interested. It is not a political proposition, but appeals to all who desire to see all sections of our great country develop. It is a great problem and should be solved in the interest of the whole people.

Good roads from every railroad town to every country home will soon solve the problem of the high cost of living and permit many city toilers to enjoy the fresh air and sunshine which the great Creator of the Universe intended we should all share.

They will improve the social and economic welfare of our people and mark an epoch in our educational and intellectual ad-

The guidepost pointing to the land of greatest opportunity will be turned toward the centers of rural life.

Farm values will be increased and the cost of transporta-tion reduced. The business man in the city can enjoy the beauties of the country and the farmer come in closer touch with the every-day activities of life.

The State which I have the honor in part to represent has established a highway department and under the estimates included in the report on the bill will receive over $1,600,000. I sincerely hope the bill will become a law. [Applause.]

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. [Applause.]
Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of Federal road building, and I can state briefly why I take this position. First, I believe it is a proper function of the Federal Government to better the road conditions of the country, or at least to assist in bettering them. In the second place, I believe that the initiation of this sort of a proposition will stimulate better road building on the part of the State. Over in my State, Ohio, we have been trying to work out a system of road building, and I am sure that what the Federal Government is about to do will be a great stimulus to our State to go on and further its plans. In the third place, I believe that when we stimulate road building on the part of the Federal Government, associated with the same kind of work on the part of the State govern-ment, we will also stimulate private efforts that will build great highways ultimately, such as are being proposed in some sections of the country now.

In the fourth place, I think our greatest problem just now is to find a better material out of which to build roads. Really, I think it is the most serious problem we have; and, when we start the Government to doing this, there is not a doubt but it will find better material out of which to build the roads and ultimately we will have a better system by far than we would have if our Government did not stimulate an interest in it.

And, fifth, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] said, I think that the great movement of the country to-day is the centralization of schools—not to build the centralized school in the little village, but to build it outside of the village—in the country—and establish what in many States we are establishing, the township high school, which is one of the great movements of the country. [Applause.]

Therefore I am strongly in favor of Federal aid in the building of roads, because it will stimulate State enterprise and, at the same time, it will stimulate individual enterprise and, at the same time, discover the better material out of which to build roads and to insure a great deal better condition for our rural communities in every way. And for that reason I believe it a legitimate function of our Government, as our past history shows it to be. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, better methods of transportation, whether by water, rail, or pike, have always appealed to our country as a rational function of government.

From the very beginning routes of trade were interesting pics with our makers of history. Canal building was one of topics with our makers of history. Canal building was one of the chief concerns of Gen. Washington, whose writings are filled with allusions to inspection trips looking to canal building to unite the East with what was then the unknown West.

Perhaps the most significant recommendation upon the subject was made by Gen. Washington at the meeting at Alexandria looking to the building of a canal from the headwaters of the Potomac to the headwaters of the Monongahela. It was this suggestion that led to the famous Annapolis meeting in 1786, the precursor of the more famous Federal convention of 1787

This idea of internal improvements took such deep hold upon the early leaders that it almost became a campaign slogan in some cases. Jefferson, a stickler for strict construction when out of office, became the first builder of the famous Cumber-land Road when he came into office. The work was furthered by another strict constructionist-Monroe.

At this time, under Monroe, the proposal to build the Erie Canal—nicknamed "Clinton's Big Ditch," because of the interest of the governor of the Empire State—became an acute issue. Here the matter of "internal improvements" on a national issue became prominent. The strict construction statesmen succeeded in defeating the proposal to the Government by the New York commissioners to undertake the building of the canal. The old issue between local and Federal construction was bitterly fought out. The same contention is frequently made in river and harbor improvements. In most of these contentions the issue resulted in the triumph of national improvements.

So it will be with this movement for better roads. In none of these previous enterprises were the country folk to be so much benefited as is proposed in this bill. Great highways, by water or rail or national road, are beneficial in a large sense; but a system of good roads that looks to the modernizing of the country sections, so much in need of better thoroughfares, will redound to the welfare of the producer in the rural communities, a people too apt to be overlooked by the legislator.

This bill, although not ideal, attempts to reconcile any possible conflict between Nation and State by making road building mutually beneficial by requiring cooperation between National and State aid.

It is also written with a view of not only giving to each desired authority, but it respects the probable character of the road determined upon by the material for road building in the locality of the construction by providing for three classes of roads and the ratio of aid by Federal authority to each class. I am in favor of Federal aid to road building because it is a function of the Government to assist the rural sections of the country, where without such assistance improvements would be lacking—to the perpetual hurt of the communities in interest as well as to the Nation at large. In our country to improve a part will benefit the whole.

I am in favor of this proposed aid because it is in keeping with our national policy throughout the past. Most certainly a believer in Hamiltonian policies would favor it, and it is a source of comfort to see how this Democratic House, followers of Jefferson, can so easily adopt the political theory of Mr. Hamilton, which is done not only here, but in the case of railroad building in Alaska, as well as in the currency legislation of the special session.

I am in favor of this proposed legislation because it goes upon the basis that our country rests upon the principle that each must be for all and all for each. To improve a part of the country benefits the whole country, and should appeal to the old as well as the new State, the rich as well as the poor State, the well-improved as well as unimproved, the States with good roads as well as those with bad roads. In this, as in all life, the strong must help the weak, the rich must be willing to help the poor, however this bill attempt an equitable benefit based upon population and road mileage of postal roads.

I am for this bill because Federal initiative in this matter will prove a wonderful stimulus to all the State, both those in the vanguard of road improvement, as well as those laggard on the subject. In Ohio road building has become a slogan before our people. We are on the way to have in the near future one of the best systems of roads in all the States. This Federal movement will give my own State a million and a quarter of dollars annually to complete our system. Who can estimate the results of such stimulus upon the State?

This dual stimulus of Nation and State will have a cumulative effect upon individual and organized effort for great highways. It is certainly true that we may look to the time when our country will be as prominent in road building for all the country as was the famous Roman period of highway building.

I am in favor of this beginning as proposed in this bill because of the general effect it will have upon our people as a whole. It will make farm life much more desirable. It will tend to keep upon the farm those who would prefer the farm to the city if an easy way of reaching the city were possible. It makes possible the success of the rural mail with less efforts to the Government and greater convenience to the farmer. It renders the farm the choice place of residence, because it gives him the advantage of access to the town without suffering the disadvantage of residence in the town.

It makes possible the success of the modern movement of cenralizing our country schools by enabling a township to erect at a convenient point a modern high school, where all the advantages of a modern city school can be had with none of the distracting elements so deleterious to habits of study such as are inevitable in all the towns.

From the standpoints of social and economical as well as homely virtues this is a movement in the right direction. I am in favor of the bill for another very important reason, and I wish we might be able to take steps at once to make sure of this result. This bill, or any Federal movement to construct good roads, will stimulate our experts in the science of material to discover the proper material for road building that will not so easily wear out. On the other hand, it will tend to more effectively execute the regulations against the abuse of the roads when once built. In the matter of material it is notorious that we have not yet found what is necessary to insure a good road after it is built. In my own district we have strips of road which were built as types of good roads. One stretch of 12 miles, from Xenia to Jamestown—the latter place is the The files, from Xenia to Jamestown—the latter place is the residence of Hon. Jesse Taylor, the editor of Better Roads and an expert on the subject—was built as a model road. I append a portion of an editorial taken from the Xenia Gazette, a statement that can be applied to almost any road, even though it was built as a model piece of road construction.

In one of the very best agricultural and stock-raising counties in the glorious State of Ohio, where a large amount of money is spent annually for road making and for road improvement, in the county where lives one of the foremost advocates for good roads, who is the editor of the Better Roads Magazine, there is evidently something the matter with our system of road construction or with the enforcement of the laws to protect the roads after we have made them.

You remember that two or three years ago we had constructed one of the finest pieces of macadam road in the State of Ohlo between Xenia and Jamestown, and yet within a single year much of it was allowed to be cut up by unlawfully heavy hauling, so that right away extensive repairs had to be made.

As to the matter of road construction, we noticed that our Goes correspondent a few days since made a just criticism of a matter that has long been a grievous blunder in this respect. He alluded to the loose manner allowed in cases where persons are permitted to work out their road tax under township supervision. He says that so-called gravel is put upon the roads which is often one-half or three-fourths sand, which has no resisting or wearing quality; that such material is only a nuisance in either very dry or real wet weather, when dust or mud is the result—the dust for those who have to follow the automobiles in summer, the mud for all who have to travel in wet weather.

We suppose it is the duty of the road supervisors to see that good material only is used, but we all know that this duty is not always well performed, and that teamsters working out road tax are allowed sometimes to put in the time in a way that is of little or no advantage to the road. This shows that there is a screw loose somewhere in our road-making system.

We presume that, in a general way, it is the duty of the county commissioners to have an oversight of the roads, but their manifold duties are such that they can not possibly see that every road supervisor in every district in the county does his duty. Perhaps we may impose this, with his ten thousand other duties, on our new county agricultural superintendent.

When the National Government sets out upon a campaign of better road building, which is evident will continue for some years, new interest will set the expert to work in his laboratory for the discovery of a material that will be proof against the ravages of the automobile. There is no doubt that such a material will be found and at such price as to be usable.

It will also stimulate authorities to regulate the use of the roads, not only the speed of the motorist but also the weight of the traffic man. Mr. Chairman, for these and other reasons I shall vote for this bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. Church]. [Applause.]

[Mr. CHURCH addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my colleague [Mr. SCOTT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Scott] is recognized.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I feel that all the people of this country ought to be greatly felicitated upon the fact that their Representatives are gathered here engaged in framing a measure so greatly calculated to further their welfare.

I believe that all the people of this country would be impressed with a deep feeling of gratitude if they knew their Representatives were here, staying until nearly midnight, to promote this great measure. And, if I mistake not, before the year upon which we have just entered draws to a close a great many of the constituents of the gentlemen who are here tenight will hear of it, and, of course, I hope they will. [Applause.

This is an important measure, in my opinion, not merely be-cause it is calculated to benefit the farmer, but because it is calculated to benefit the country as a whole. In one respect in particular it is calculated to benefit the farmer, because it is calculated to equip the farms of this country. There was in particular it is calculated to benefit the farmer, because it is calculated to equip the farms of this country. There was a time that we used to think that it took only 160 acres to make a good farm; but we have come to the conclusion that it takes a good deal more than that, Mr. Chairman. It takes not only 160 acres, well equipped and well improved, to make a good farm, but it takes good roads; good roads to the local station; good railroads and good railroad facilities to the greater markets; good facilities to carry the products of the farm to the ultimate consumer.

greater markets; good facilities to carry the products of the farm to the ultimate consumer.

Not only do these things help the farmers and those who reside in rural communities, but they give stability to the whole country. We live in a country where the stability of the farming community, the stability of the great rural sections of the country, is the foundation of the whole fabric. Whenever those who live in the agricultural sections are unprosperous the whole country is unprosperous. Whenever they meet adversity that adversity is deflected not only to their local towns. versity, that adversity is deflected not only to their local towns but to every city of the land. It should be one of the first considerations of the Congress of the United States to legislate not only upon this but upon every great question and policy in such a way as to foster, conserve, and build up the agricultural sections of the country. We should not overlook the fact that when we build and conserve and protect those interests we are conserving and protecting the interests of every citizen within the length and breadth of the land. No man or woman can be prosperous in this country when the farmers and those intimately connected with the products of the farm are not prosperous. [Applause.]

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Lobeck].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. Lo-

BECK] is recognized.

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Prouty] for giving me the opportunity to make a few remarks on the good-roads bill now before the

I did not intend to speak on this subject this evening, but with the great interest I have in good roads I therefore feel constrained to do so, and I am pleased to see that the Members present are interested in having good roads constructed throughout the land. I shall favor the bill because it is a step in the right direction. [Applause.] I have had personal experience with the roads in the States of Iowa and Nebraska.

I formerly lived in the district which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Prouty] so ably represents. My first experience was along the Government military roads on both sides of the Des Moines River. These were the only roads we had that were good in the early days. Later, when the country was surveyed, settlers fenced their lands and the section lines were followed. It seemed that we struck every mudhole and every slough in that district. Therefore improvements on the roads were neces-

The early settlers did as well as could be expected in the pioneer days of improving the roads, and they have been constantly improving the roads since in Iowa and Nebraska, and at the present time the roadways compare favorably with any of the middle Western States.

But we are in better shape to improve the roads than we have been heretofore in the country's history. We have now improved road machinery, graders, crushers, mixers, rollers—for great improvements have been made in road-building machinery in the last 10 or 20 years. Quite different from our fore-fathers, who only had the pick and shovel and a strong back to do the arduous work of road building in their time.

We are also living in a "cement age," which has helped so materially to make good roads, for cement culverts and bridges are taking the place of wood culverts and bridges which rapidly wear and wash out. We know more in this twentieth century about road construction, and understand the value of proper drainage. In our State of Nebraska we have an inheritance tax that is applied for the benefit of good roads, and the sums so derived are used for the construction and building of country roads.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Nebraska yield?

Mr. LOBECK. Yes; with pleasure. Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I heard the gentleman say something about mudholes. I want to ask him if those mud-holes came by reason of irrigation in Nebraska. [Laughter.] Mr. LOBECK. I will tell the gentleman what is his trouble.

The gentleman has probably only lived in one State; therefore his question is pardonable. I am cosmopolitan and have lived in three States and have had experience with mud roads.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I know there are some places in Oklahoma and in Kansas, together with Texas and Nebraska, where they would give a great deal for a mudhole. [Laughter.]
Mr. LOBECK. Well, I understand the gentleman represents that kind of a district. [Renewed laughter.]

Before the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] interrupted me, I was speaking of what we have in our own State.

We have an inheritance tax that goes to the benefit of public roads in the country districts. In my district we have as good roads to-day as there are in any district anywhere, and it is very profitable in that it helps the farmer and gardeners in bringing their produce to market.

We have constructed macadam roads and brick roads, and we find that a brick road is much more durable, and my opinion is that a brick-paved roadway is cheaper in the end than macadam and needs very little repair. We have some brick-paved roads that have been used for over 20 years and the repair cost is nominal, but the macadam constantly needs repairing.

Mr. COX. How much do your macadam roads cost you per

Mr. LOBECK. I do not know exactly, but will endeavor to get the figures for the RECORD.

Mr. COX. What do the brick roads cost?

Mr. LOBECK. The first cost is considerably more than macadam, [Laughter.]
Mr. COX. I was asking the gentleman for information.

Mr. LOBECK. I will be glad to put the figures in the RECORD. But a good brick road will stand heavy travel with very little wear for a lifetime.

The total number of miles of paved roads in Douglas County,

Nebr., is 44.06, subdivided as follows:

TEATTON AND THE OWNER.	Length.	Width.	· Cost.
Macadam	Miles, 36, 92 2, 61 2, 36 2, 17	Feet. 16 16 16 16	$10,000 to $12,000 per mile. $2.30 per square yard. Not available. $12,000 per mile.
Total	44.06

The total amount of inheritance taxes collected since the enactment of the law amounts to $411,404.82, and expended on country roads in my county.

We hear much talk about the good roads in foreign countries. For the length of time this country has been developing the people of the United States have done very well, and our people should not be criticized. We have been busy developing the resources of a new country, and good roads will follow.

The Europeans built great military roads and had to have them to move their armies, and they have been centuries in building them.

We have a new country freighted with possibilities beyond our comprehension. In the older settlements and States there are better roads than in the new West, but the Western States are coming rapidly to the front in good-road construction, and this appropriation will be helpful.

The people of to-day have a better knowledge of the construction of roads, culverts, and bridges, knowledge of soils, drainage, and paving.

There is a universal demand by the people for better roads, so that the products of agriculture can be brought to the consumer rapidly and at less cost to the producer. And there is no more opportune time for Congress to assist by appropriation of funds in good substantial road building than at this moment. I favor the bill and shall vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from

Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY]

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Chairman, it would be very difficult to enumerate all the benefits of good roads. They are so manifold and so well known that it is only necessary to call attention to the fact that good roads are one of the greatest advantages to any nation, and then I can pass on to other subjects relating to the bill.

This question of appropriating $25,000,000 a year out of the Federal Treasury for the uplift of rural communities is merely a matter that reduces itself down to the question whether it is good or bad business judgment. This is not taking money from any foreign people and giving it to another people. It is simply spending the money of all our people for the benefit of all of our people-that is, if we spend it wisely.

I happen to represent at this time a city district, the city of Portland, having 260,000 population. When I cast my vote upon this bill I believe I shall cast it in accordance with the wishes of nine-tenths of the voters of my district, and I shall cast my vote in favor of this appropriation. [Applause.]

The people of the United States contribute this money that we are going to spend. The farmers contribute their share when they buy sugar, when they buy tobacco, when they buy any article that pays either an internal-revenue tax or an external customs duty. Those who pay income taxes will help to contribute to the Federal Treasury. Some of those live in the country and some in the cities. But the building of good contribute to the Federal Treasury. Some of those live in the country and some in the cities. But the building of good roads is of such benefit to the Nation as a whole, both to the producer and the consumer, that it would be difficult to tell whether it would be the producer or the consumer, the farmer or the city dweller, who will get the greater benefit out of the passage of this measure. The high cost of living will undoubtedly be reduced by the building of good roads, by the encouragement of men and women to remain in the rural districts, to remain on the farms, by reducing the cost of transporting farm products to the city home, by extending our parcel post, by extending rural free delivery.

No doubt it seems strange to many of us here to-night that

No doubt it seems strange to many of us here to-night that this question has been delayed so long. I wish especially to congratulate the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Shackleford] for his untiring efforts in bringing this bill before the American House of Representatives. [Applause.] It has been difficult to bring it to final determination and a final vote, because of its novelty. The American people, who come from English, Scotch, German, and other European stock, are naturally conservative. For that reason they have been slow to start in this great work, but now the time is coming. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. Harrison].

Mr. Harrison. Mr. Chairman, I am in hearty sympathy with the provisions of this bill,

I know of no appropriation that we can make that will bring greater benefit to all the people of this country than this approprintion for good roads.

The degree of development of every country has depended on the progress of transportation facilities.

It would be highly foolish for any person to produce or manufacture a surplus of anything if he were cut off from a means of conveying his products to the market. And just as convenient and perfect as are his means of transporting his products to the market will his profits depend.

Good roads to the farmer who must carry the products of his labor to the railroad station will mean a saving to him in many ways. He can convey heavier loads at less expense; the lack of strain on the part of his stock will insure them a longer life, the vehicles less wear; and the time for making the trip materially decreased.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, every element that enters into good roads reflects itself in an increased profit and benefit to the farmer

If it helps the farmer, then certainly it will help the merchant and consumer in the city, because it will not only enable him to get his products more quickly from the farm, but he will be permitted to share in the reduced expense of transportation.

The progress of a section depends on the prosperity of the farmer, and the roads of any community are the best index to the character of its people.

There is a wrong impression, in my opinion, among some of the Members here that the people in the cities are not favorable to this legislation, and that it is solely in the interest of the country folks. Do not be deceived. The people in the towns and cities are in sympathy with the good-roads movement and believe in good roads as much as the people in the country. I know in the towns of my district there is a wonderful sentiment for good roads. I receive from their commercial bodies many requests for data, and they are constantly requesting experts to be sent there to construct experimental good roads in order to stimulate sentiment and educate the people in this movement.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to inquire of the gentleman what he thinks about the desirability of a road bill along the lines of the bill before us or one of these schemes of an international highway clear across the country?

Mr. HARRISON. I am not in favor of an international highway across the country. [Applause.]

Mr. FERRIS. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that, because that is an automobile game and this is the people's

Mr. HARRISON. I believe that the best way to encourage the people of each locality to have good roads is by aiding them, even with as small amount as this bill carries, for it is in that way we will have good roads in the various communities of this country.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.
Mr. RUCKER. In the line of the argument the gentleman has just made, he speaks of the sentiment in the towns in his district in behalf of good roads. I suggest to the gentleman that I believe it is almost universally true nowadays, in the smaller towns particularly, that the commercial bodies tax themselves by voluntary contributions to go out and improve their roads, all around the inland towns. I say that as a suggestion in support of the gentleman's argument.

Mr. HARRISON. I think that is true, and they are doing a wonderful service for the people.

Mr. Chairman, I can not understand why the Federal Government should not appropriate money to be expended in maintaining the postal roads in this country. The Government uses them; have the constitutional authority for it; and it certainly brings a great benefit to a large number of people.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. MOORE. Considering the large amounts of money appropriated in large cities for the improvements of highways and the gentleman think that $60 and $30 and $15 will be of any great benefit to the rural community

Mr. HARRISON. I think it will be of some benefit, and it certainly will be an incentive and an encouragement to the people to do more in the future than they have in the past. do not know that it has ever come to me so forcibly-the desirability of having good roads—as it did six weeks ago, when the President of the United States spent his vacation at Pass Christian. We thought that along the coast of Mississippi for twenty-odd miles we had the best shell road in the country. I so painted it to the President. But when we drove over it the first day after he arrived there it seemed to me that every slight depression in it was a gully and every pool of water was a lake, and for the first time it dawned upon the people of that locality that it was not a really good road. The President's visit aroused the people and started a movement for better roads, and now all the towns on the Mississippi coast are cooperating together. Only the other day I received a letter from them to have the Public Roads Department send them certain data on the subject and putting in a requisition for experts to be sent there. That was the sentiment created by that one incident in my district, and I believe it is strong all over the State of Mississippi.

I stated in the beginning that the progress of any locality, section, or country depends on transportation facilities, whether it be water, railway, or road transportation.

Believing, therefore, in cheap water transportation and in good-road building, I am always glad to use my every effort in assisting in passing such legislation. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, in this connection, that there is one other transportation facility that has been the forerunner of development in every age-railroads. It is on that theory-because I have not had and shall not have an opportunity of expressing myself in the discussion in that I desire to say that I expect to vote for the Alaskan railroad bill. [Applause.] I have listened attentively to the very elaborate discussion on that subject, and at first I was inclined to oppose its passage, but the arguments in favor of it and the reasons assigned in its behalf have been so convincing that I am now most heartily in favor of its passage. Alaska belongs to the United States. We are in duty bound either to lease the natural resources there or develop them. It is not denied that the undeveloped resources of Alaska are most wonderful. You have decided on holding them, then why not develop them? The Government needs the rich deposits of minerals there, especially the coal. The development of the West, the growing importance of the nations on the other side of the globe, makes it necessary that this Government shall maintain a large fleet in the Pacific waters. If this be true, it will be necessary to use unlimited tons of coal for fuel purposes. The only other section to get coal from will be that section around West Virginia and Pennsylvania. The cost of this coal there is high, and the transportation expense in getting it from the Atlantic seaboards to the Pacific waters will be great. The saving in the coal resources of Alaska alone will within a few years pay for the cost of the railroad. I need not mention the other developments that will follow its construction. Whenever and wherever a railroad has touched an undeveloped country its lands have increased in value, cities have sprung up, and resources have become developed.

I am not one of those who believe that the principle of Government ownership of railroads is interwoven in this question. The Government for over half a century donated large tracts of Government lands for railroad construction. My State followed that principle for many years, not because it believed in Government ownership of railroads as a policy but because it believed in the development of the country and knew that the best way to develop it was through the building of railroads and highways.

In the fifties, when the Illinois Central Railroad was planned to traverse my State, the legislature of it instructed its Sena-tors, one of whom was Jefferson Davis, to vote for a grant of thousands of acres of her richest and best lands to this railroad to aid it in its construction, and he carried out their instruc-

Now, as a business Government, acting within constitutional limits, here is the question: Alaska is the property of this Government, unlike a State. It has such resources as the Government needs. They are now worthless, but through an ex-penditure of some money those needed resources, especially coal, which the Government now pays high prices for, can be developed and large sums of money can be saved to the Government. I ask you is it best, therefore, for the Government to lease these resources to private capitalists, to be exploited such sums as are appropriated in the small communities, does and large profits made by them, or for the Government to do it and conserve its resources, develop a wonderful country, and in time save money for its taxpayers?

For my part I expect to vote for the bill and assist in unlocking the richest storehouse of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, for over 20 years—in fact, before I became of age—I have been a strong advocate in my home State for the improvement of our highways. I expect that I was one of the few men in this House to incorporate in my platform when I ran for Congress the advocacy of Federal aid for public highways. In conformity with my preelection pledges to my constituents the first act of mine as a Member of the Sixty-second Congress was to introduce a bill almost identical with the bill now under consideration, which expresses the views of the most able gentlemen who constitute the Committee on Roads.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Shackleford] and one or two others and myself constituted the "advance guard" for this legislation. No man on this floor will rejoice more than I will when the roll is called and the vote cast passing this bill through this Democratic House, for the reason, Mr. Chairman, no one bill will ever pass this House again committing this Government to a policy that will have a more wholesome effect upon the prosperity of this Nation.

Since the year 1900 the people of the entire United States have entered into a movement for the establishment throughout the country of good roads. Since this date the wealthy States of the Union have made great strides toward the improvement of their public highways.

The question of transportation has been paramount to all other questions since the dawn of civilization, and the evolution in the method and modes of transportation has been most wonderful.

Until the end of time there will be three methods of transportation, namely, railroads, water, and wagon. These methods are absolutely dependent upon one another. The railroad can not live without the wagon, and neither the railroad nor the wagon would perform its full function in the development of our Nation if it were not for the great trans-Atlantic steamships entering and leaving our ports. Each has a very important and independent function to perform in intrastate, interstate, and foreign commerce.

Two of our great systems of transportation, namely, railroads and steamship lines, have been taken over by private corporations and are operated for pecuniary gain; the third, transportation by wagon over public highways, has been taken over by the several States of the Union, and their common use is accorded to all of the people free of charge.

Those of us who have failed to give the question of transportation and its consequential tax upon the people some degree of study do not realize how great the burden carried by the people from this source is. For the convenience of this discussion we will call it a transportation tax, and we will divide the methods of transporting our commerce into three subdivisions, namely, rail, water, and wagon; and by comparison we will see whether or not the question of transportation is of more vital interest to the American people than all other questions, including the tariff and other burdens carried by direct taxation in the several States. For an understanding of the discussion of this subject we should first look into the different systems by which the people are called upon to pay tribute by way of direct and indirect taxation for the maintenance of the General Government, Federal, State, county, and municipal.

The Federal Government imposes an import, internal-revenue, and corporation tax, which in all instances is added necessarily to the cost of the imported article and the article upon which the internal revenue is imposed, and in fixed charges for the operation of the corporation paying the tax.

The State, the county, and the municipal governments levy an ad valorem tax upon the citizen according to what he pos-

Any certain and fixed charge against the people from which they can not escape, and which is necessarily essential to their livelihood and existence, may be justly termed a tax. It will be seen further on in this discussion that the import, internalrevenue, State, county, and municipal taxes sink into utter insignificance when compared with the per capita tax imposed by railroad, water, and wagon transportation. Transportation lays its heavy hand upon all we eat, upon all we wear, upon the fuel we burn, upon the oil in the poor man's lamp, upon the lumber in our humble homes, upon the implements of the farms, upon all that is animate and inanimate moving from one place to another

The railroads in our country have grown in magnitude and efficiency until we have perfected in America the greatest railroad system upon the habitable globe. Our navigable streams and Great Lakes are teeming with vessels, great and small, engaged in interstate traffic. Rivers and harbors are being generously dealt with by our Government in lavish appropriations for their development.

We now come to a question with which this Government has miserly dealt, practically closing its purse strings to this great need of the Nation. There is no country in the world having as many miles of public highways as the United States; there is no country upon the habitable globe making any pretense at civilization, having any roads at all, which has not more improved roads than the United States. The great retarding influence in the healthy growth of our country is the great army of unemployed in the large cities and the movement from the rural districts to the cities, which is perfectly natural as a consequence of the prevailing conditions in the country districts of our Nation. I firmly believe that the time is upon us, if this Nation expects to retain the balance of trade in its favor with the other nations of the world, that she must lend her powerful aid in the construction of good roads throughout the land.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Borland] seems to think that we who represent southern constituencies would fear this bill as an invasion of State rights. As far as the invasion of State rights is concerned, I hope that none of my colleagues will be unduly alarmed about the provisions of this measure. So far as I am informed, in the past the Southern States especially have been strict in their views upon the question of State rights, but I do not think that when the Government seeks to lend its beneficent aid for the upbuilding of the States they need have any fear that the States of the Union will interpose an objection to the Government appropriating money for the construction and maintenance of public highways. It is only when the Government seeks to take something away from, instead of donate something to, that the States interpose their objection to an invasion of State rights.

It will be stated that it will bankrupt the Nation to lend its aid in the construction of highways, but before this attack shall be made upon the measure let me call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that one of the most beneficent branches of our departmental service, namely, the Rural Delivery Service, is to-day traversing 42,000 different highways of the Nation and coming in daily contact with 20,000,000 of our people living in the rural districts of our country. Let me further admonish those who may have in mind an attack upon this measure on the ground that it is paternal legislation that this Government has been placed upon record completely when in the early struggles of our railroads it donated to their aid in the construction of these great arteries of transportation millions of acres of our public lands, valued at over $1,000,000,000; that we have appropriated for rivers and harbors since 1875, $592,305,000; we have appropriated for building levees upon the Mississippi River, to June 30, 1902, $16,582,000; we have appropriated for public buildings, to June 30, 1911, $213,376,000; estimated appropriations for the Panama Canal, $400,000,000; appropriations for road building in Porto Rico, the Philippines, the Canal Zone, and Alaska, $8,300,000—for public highways during the period of the making of these appropriations in the United States not the making of these appropriations in the United States not one dollar.

We have in the United States 2,199,645 miles of public highways, of which only 190,679 miles, or 8.66 per cent of the total, are improved. When this statement is made as to the number of miles of public highways, Congress immediately associates with the statement the bankruptcy of the Nation if it undertakes to lend its aid to their improvement. It is estimated by the Office of Public Roads that 90 per cent of the travel over our public highways is confined to 30 per cent of our roads, and that the improvement of 440,000 miles of public roads would practically meet the present demands throughout the country. So, after all, it is nothing like as gigantic a proposition to construct good roads as Federal pensions, the maintenance of the Army and Navy, nor would the annual appropriation ever reach a sum as large as was added to the Federal pension roll a few days ago by this House without a tremor in the voice of a man who advocated it or who voted for it.

Mr. Chairman, to prove the absolute inability of the poorer and sparsely settled States of the Union to cope with the question of road improvement, the States of Indiana, Ohio, New York, Wisconsin, Kentucky, Illinois, California, and Massachusetts, out of a total of 190,679 miles of improved roads, have within their confines 108,093 miles of this total. Therefore, I mention these facts for the purpose of giving courage to this House that they may give this measure the consideration which it justly deserves at the hands of the representatives of the American people.

Mr. Chairman, the sooner we, as Members of Congress, realize the fact that the money in the Treasury Building at the other end of the Avenue does not belong to us to dish out to the favored departments of this Government as we see the political exigencies demand, but that we are here only holding the commission of our people as their agents, to distribute their money for the maintenance and upbuilding of this Nation as they think best and wisest, the sooner we will conform to the true measure placed upon us by the people when they elected us and sent us here as their direct agents.

There is hardly a day passing over the head of a single Member of this House that we could not urge, and rightfully so, constitutional objections to appropriations that are made because it is expedient to the welfare of the Government that they be made. Now, Mr. Chairman, just because the farming element of the Nation does not happen to live upon a navigable stream, or does not happen to have a fort on their plantations, or happen to have a harbor in front of their homes, or a military post in their back yards is no reason why they should not have money appropriated which redounds to the benefit of every man, woman, and child living in the interior portions of our great country.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1910 shows that the tariff revenues aggregated $333,683,445. There are 18,400,000 families in the United States, according to the last census, and the tariff tax apportioned among these families would amount to $18.13 per family.

The Interstate Commerce Commission reports that the gross earnings of the railroads from transportation alone for the same period aggregated $2,787,266,136. If this amount is divided by the number of families in the United States it will be found that the transportation tax from the railroads amounted to $151.48 per family, and further pursuing the problem, if this amount is divided by the number of inhabitants in the United States, it will be found that this tax equals $30 per capita per annum, or $2.50 per month upon every man, woman, and child. In addition to the railroad transportation tax, it is estimated that water transportation for the fiscal year 1906-7 amounted to $550,000,000, or $5.98 per capita. For the same period it is estimated that wagon transportation taxed the people of the United States $1,600,000,000, or $17.39 per capita.

In all probability the question will be asked how the cost of wagon transportation can be estimated with any degree of ac-To be perfectly frank with you, it can not be estimated with mathematical certainty as to the annual cost, but it is estimated by the Office of Public Roads that the average distance to market in the United States is 9.4 miles, and that the average cost for wagon transportation in this country is 25 cents per ton per mile. The total amount of freight handled by rail and water for the fiscal year 1906-7 was, in round numbers, 1,100,000,000 tons.

It is estimated that more than half of this tonnage was hauled to and from the railway and waterway by wagon; and it would be fair to estimate that as much as one-third more was finally hauled to the consumer by wagon on what we may term a second handling, making a total of 800,000,000 tons hauled by wagon. In addition to this, a large bulk of the cotton crop, which amounts approximately to 3,000,000 tons annually, is hauled from the farm to the gin, thence back to the farm, and finally to the railroad or wharf. The cost of this extra haul is not included in the above estimate. It should also be stated that large quantities of agricultural, forest, and miscellaneous products are first hauled in their crude state over the common roads before they reach the railroads and waterways, thus necessitating a rehauling of these products. So it is perfectly fair to estimate that the per capita transportation tax on the people of this country amounts to $53.37 as against a tariff tax of $18.13.

It is estimated by the Director of the Office of Public Roads, Mr. Logan Waller Page, who, in my opinion, is the greatest expert on road building and wagon transportation in the world to-day, that after a very careful study of this question by him he has discovered that the cost of transportation over the magnificent roads of England, Germany, and France by wagon is only 10 cents per ton per mile. But, eliminating any doubt as to the cost in these countries of transporting a ton a mile by wagon, we will say that it amounts to 121 cents per ton per mile. If by the construction of good roads in the United States we can reduce the cost of wagon transportation from 25 cents per ton per mile to 121 cents per ton per mile, we will save the people of this country, on this item alone, at the very least calculation, $500,000,000 per annum.

In 1817 the wagoners using the old Cumberland Road only charged 18 cents per ton per mile for hauling upon this highway, and it is said that this allowed a profit to the wagoner. the average cost of wagon transportation per ton per mile is hand, in 1837 the railroads charged 71 cents per ton per mile, and to-day the cost of hauling by rail is about three-fourths of a cent per ton per mile, or about one-tenth of the original rate. Previous to 1825, when the Erie Canal was completed the cost of transporting a ton of merchandise between Buffalo and New York was $100. The rate of transportation over the Erie Canal at its opening ranged from $6 to $15 per ton, but about 25 years later the average rate was $3 to $7 per ton. The average cost of transportation on the Great Lakes and inland waterways is estimated at from one-third to one-fourth of a cent per ton per mile. In other words, it is found that for $1 it is possible to haul I ton 4 miles on the average country road, about 10 miles on a good highway, 140 miles by rail, 350 to 400 miles by lakes or inland waterways, and about 1,300 miles on the open sea: In short, before the farmer can avail himself of these cheaper means of transportation he must overcome the great barrier between his field and the nearest railroad station or

At the present time it costs the average American farmer about 1.6 per cent more to haul a bushel of wheat a distance of 9.4 miles from his farm to the neighboring railroad station than it does to ship it from New York to Liverpool, a distance of 3 100 miles:

If we had a system of good roads throughout the country, the farmers would save in the cost of wagon transportation of the cotton crop annually $5,076,183; of the wheat crop, $10,256,058; of the corn crop, $12,709,278; whereas it now costs for wagon transportation to get these three great crops to market twice this sum

THE EFFECTS OF GOOD ROADS UPON FARM VALUES.

It is estimated that good roads would add from $2 to $10 per acre to land values. The total area of farm lands in the United States in 1900 was 850,000,000 acres. It is estimated an increase of $5 per acre, by the construction of good roads, would add to our taxable values $4,250,000,000 per annum.

One of the greatest drawbacks to the farmer is the fact that under the present condition of the roads throughout the country he is practically isolated from market during the winter months. This is especially true in the South, where we do not have the continuous hard freezes incident to the climate of the States ferther north. No matter what prices cotton, corn, wheat, or other farm products are quoted at on a given day, if the roads are impassable the farmer is helpless to take advantage of the high prices; then when the roads are in passable condition and the great bulk of the staple crops is still in the hands of the farmer a general movement to market necessarily follows and depresses prices, and the farmer is the loser thereby.

Another great item of cost and loss to the country is in the fact that the very time the farmer should be doing his hauling is when the ground is too wet and the weather too bad to till the soil and work his crops, but at that time the roads are also impassable; therefore he will necessarily be compelled to take good weather to market his crops and do his hauling, when he could be devoting his time to his pursuits at home.

Mr. Chairman, for the last few years we have been continually hearing the cry from every source of "Back to the farm. The brainy boys and girls of our rural districts are continually seeking to escape the social conditions prevalent in the country during the long, dreary, winter months of the year, attributable almost entirely to bad roads. The drift of our population from the rural districts to the cities is really becoming alarming. Much of the social isolation has been ameliorated by the extension of telephone lines in the country and rural free delivery, but these great conveniences do not yet satisfy those who live upon the farm. Instead of the winter months in the rural districts being the most pleasant and profitable of the year, they mean absolute social isolation. Bad roads prevent attendance at school and church; they make literary societies, social gatherings, club and lodge meetings practically impossible during the bad weather of the winter.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that I know the people who live upon the farms of this country as well as anyone. They are the most sociable people on the face of the earth. They love to go to church; they are ambitious to send their children to school. They love to visit one another and exchange ideas; they love to visit the sick; and when the week end comes they want to go to the nearest village store. The Representatives in this House who live in the large cities, either in an apartment house or in a private dwelling, can not appreciate these people. If a newcomer moves into the community, all the neighbors go and visit him and welcome him in their midst; but we can live in the large cities in an apartment house or next door to a family for 10 years and never know their names. So the cry of back more than it was 90 years ago on this road, while, on the other I to the farm will not be met, in my opinion, until something is done to make country life more attractive and the development of the farm more rapid.

In 1850, 12.5 per cent of the population of the United States were living in cities of 2,500 or over; in 1890, 35 per cent; in 1900, 40 per cent; in 1910, 46 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, the United States is the only powerful nation on earth that does not lend its aid in the construction of highways, and to-day, by the failure of this Government to do its part in the upbuilding of the Nation, it is suffering, from a commercial standpoint, the loss of millions upon millions of dollars. Just to think, the exports and imports of Germany, Belgium, and Holland, three little countries of Europe no larger than our own State of Texas, were three times as much as the exports and imports of the United States in the year 1910, and in these countries you find as fine systems of public highways as there are in the world, penetrating every section of the country, placing the farmer and producer in easy access of the market by quick and cheap transportation.

It is to be hoped that this Democratic administration will deal more liberally with the farmer than he has been dealt with in the past. It is to be hoped that this great Government will lend its ear to the demands of that class of our people who produced upon the farms in the year 1910, $8,926,000,000 worth of farm products. We can not be too liberal in dealing with our farmers and rural population. We must extend the work of agricultural education. We must encourage the building up of our farms. We must not be unmindful of the fact that the farmer has always been found ready to do his part in the maintenance of this Government. In times of peace he has aided in our com-mercial strength more than any other citizen; in times of war he has willingly laid down his hoe to shoulder his musket in defense of his country. It is stated as a historical fact that at the Battle of Gettysburg the First Minnesota Regiment went into that battle and in 35 minutes lost 83 per cent of its men in killed and wounded; the Twenty-sixth North Carolina at the same time went in with 77 strong and at the end of three days' fighting only one man out of that company was left. Mr. Chairman, these two regiments were composed entirely of farmers, and the bravery displayed by these farmer soldiers in this great, decisive, and bloody battle of the Civil War has never been excelled by any soldiers in the history of the world.

These facts are only mentioned to call the attention of this House to the fact that the farming element of this country are not mendicants and beggars. They do not make unreasonable demands upon their country. They do not complain and grumble when they do not get everything they want; but they are making a demand of their Representatives for relief from a condition in this country which amounts to a national shame. They do not ask it solely as a contribution; they see the great economic importance of direct and immediate legislation upon this subject.

The constitutional objections that were interposed in the early history of our country by President Monroe and other strict adherents to constitutional technicalities have all been overridden and cast to the four winds of the earth by subsequent acts of Congress. It is my humble opinion that in this modern day and time no Member would seriously argue that it was unconstitutional, under Article I, section 8, of the Constitution, that Congress shall have the power to "establish post offices and post roads"; that this Congress could not appropriate money for the improvement and maintenance of roads over which this Government daily carries its mail. If the word "establish" means simply, as has been argued by great constitutional lawyers in the early history of this country, to "point out," then the Constitution, if that be the true meaning of this section, has been violated hundreds of times by the building of post offices. Surely it will not be argued that to establish post offices means to erect buildings and to establish post roads means only to point them out.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, it may be proper to say that at this moment 95 per cent of the people of this country will applaud every single Member of this House who casts his vote in favor of the improvement of our national highways, and that for one time you will not be met by your constituents with the frown with which you are usually greeted after a general appropriation bill has been passed, appropriating millions of dollars for purposes in which the farmer can see no benefit. Let a Democratic House pass this bill for the appropriation of money by the Federal Government for the construction of good roads and it will receive the plaudits of that great class of our citizens who reside in the rural districts of this great country, "Well done, good and faithful servants."

By unanimous consent leave was granted to Mr. Lobeck and to Mr. Browne of Wisconsin to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.
